A False Rumor

To the Editor of The Times:

Sir:—It has come to my notice that rumors have been circulated in Port Elgin, that the Secretary and Treasurer of the Port Elgin Branch of the Patriotic Society, viz, E. R. Sayles and James Struthers receive 10% on the amounts paid to soldiers wives and families through this branch, as payment for for their service. I desire to state for the information of the public and all parties concerned that these officials have for several years given service in connection with the distribution of this fund in Port Elgin which involves not only responsibility, but sacrifice of time, and real work of which the general public know little and possibly care less, and they have not received one cent for their services either from the fund or from any other source. For which in my opinion, they are at least entitled to the gratitude of the people. It is to be regretted that citizens do not try to ascertain the truthfulness of such rumors rather than assist in the circulation broadcast over the community of statements that are not only very unfair to the individuals concerned, but in this case are calculated to injure a cause which deserves and requires the best effort and support of all our citizens.

Yours,
D. J. Izzard,
Chairman of the Port Elgin Branch of the Canadian Patriotic Society

Mrs. William Harper

Dear Madam :—No doubt you are wondering what lonely soldier got your lovely socks. Well I did, and you bet I was more than delighted for it has just been awful cold these last few weeks, some snow and the ground is frozen hard, so those nice warm socks just come in right I have them on now and believe me, I will hate to take them off to get washed, I have some more though, so am quite comfortable at present. I am in a dug out or dirt house made in the trench and for company we have a lot of dirty fat rats running over us at night One gets used to them though. We are very well looked after though and you hear very few complaints. We have plenty to eat and tea three times a day and fish, meat quite often and we are all doing our little might to help give old Fritz a good beating which we will do I have lost several of my pals but have not got hurt myself yet. This is war, though, and a cruel one.

Now Mrs Harper I want to thank you for your kind favor. I do not know what we would do without the help of you ladies and I thank you in behalf of all the boys for your kind wishes hoping you are well as these few lines leave me quite all right. Excuse bad writing as I am writing on my knee, best to you all From yours sincerely

Pte. Walter Adams

Dear Madam :

It is with great pleasure that I acknowledge the reception of a good pair of socks together with a little message dated the 18th of March 1917

Will you please accept my personal and my comrade's thanks for yourself and the other women whose great care for the soldiers is worth far more to us than many compliments given without any good heart feeling Being in the firing line for two years and it is a great relief for me to know that the Canadian women have not forgotten their brothers in France, and are still able to prove it by sending them what they need most.

The Nominations

The nomination of Federal candidates for North Bruce was held in the town hall, Port Elgin, on Monday, November 19th. The hall was filled to the doors and the electors were keenly alive to the situation as presented by both candidates. Mr. J. W. Reany, at 2 o'clock declared the nominations closed. Only two names were submitted, being Lieut Col. Hugh Clarke, of Kincardine, who represented the riding in the last parliament, and Mr. John McAuley, of Wiarton. Mr. Reany was moved to the chair but was asked to be excused on account of pressure of business. Mr. J. J. Hunter, Kincardine, was then elected to act as chairman.

The arrangement of time was decided by Mr. Clarke and Mr. McAuley in a satisfactory manner.

Lieut.-Col. Clarke was the first speaker. He dealt with the momentous events during the past three years. Among the most wonderful things that had happened was a Union government in Canada. This had been made possible only by the war. Recruiting in his opinion had not been a failure. Under it Canada had raised 400,000 men. In it Liberals and Conservatives had joined heart and hand. At no time had there been a definite promise that there would not be conscription. The voluntary system had succeeded in spots, but not well enough in other spots. Quebec had not done her duty. He thought when war broke out the French would spring to arms. They had a treble reason for it. Love of the homeland and allegiance to Great Britain. He was not finding fault with them. They had been educated falsely by their leaders, Liberal and Conservative alike. The introduction of the military service act was to equalize matters. Tribunals had been appointed to say who should go and who should stay. He thought they were doing their work judiciously, and it was necessary to have a Union government to carry out the military service act. Twenty-seven Liberals had voted for the act. He gave them credit for doing so. Credit was also due the Conservative ministers who had given up their portfolios to make room for the Liberals who had been taken into the government. The speaker pointed out that Liberal news papers throughout Canada were in accord on the great question of union. He said they should not be impatient if the electors did not get to-gether. He trusted they would, in the interests of the country. He explained the franchise act and many patriotic women had not been given a vote, but all women would have a vote after the war. Germans, Turks and Austrian aliens would not be allowed to vote.

Mr. John MacCauley in his opening remarks paid high tribute to the Canadians who had died on the fields of France and Flanders. They were proud of this record and were assembled today as a solid unit filled with hope and confidence that victory will be achieved by Great Britain and her allies. When he was nominated at the convention at Tara there was no union government, and there had been little prospects of one. Conditions had been changed rapidly and events have occurred quickly. What had happened in the last few months was now possible and a union government had been formed. We should put our whole strength into the war to crush our foes. The speaker's heart had always been sound on this question. He was also in favor of enlisting the entire energies of the country, not only in men, but in wealth and resources. He had informed some Liberals of the riding of his position, and if they had not been satisfied with his stand he had asked that a convention be called. No action had been taken and he believed he was in accord with true Liberal principles in the stand he had taken. He was surprised when the Hon. N. W. Rowell stated that he would not recognize him as a union candidate. When the union government was formed it was stated that in ridings where there were two union candidates one Liberal and the other Conservative, the government would not interfere, but allow them to fight it out among themselves, that was just what he wanted to do.

His exact words are as follows: "If elected as your representative I will advocate and support any and all measures that in my opinion make for winning the war. I am as much Liberal as ever. I believe in the Liberal principles of democracy as opposed to autocracy either in Europe or at Ottawa, and I believe that Liberalism has to be preserved in order that it will yet strike a body blow at the intolerable Prussianism that is springing up in this country, and I want it distinctly understand that I am appealing to the electors of North Bruce as an Independent Liberal, holding myself open at all times to support or oppose any measure as I consider it in the best interests of Canada."

He then proceeded to deal with the past Govt. record, citing the Ross Rifle, J. Wesley Allison's deals, then protection of the big interests, inferior boots and spavined horses bought for the army. He denounced the franchise act which cut off many voters who were loyal to Great Britain.

In conclusion he said, "whether elected or not, I feel that it will be my duty to do my utmost to bring success to the cause for which our brave sons of Canada have reddened the battle fields of Europe with their blood."

Mr. C. M. Bowman then spoke half an hour in which he dwelt with the government's past policy and the profiteers.

Col. Clark closed the meeting in reply, remarking that he was a Union man, without a hyphen.

Mr. C. Start, Tara, asked Mr. McAuley if he were in favor of conscription.

Mr. McAuley—It is the law of the land and I am in favor of it.

Mr. Start wanted to know if he believed in it, but the meeting came to a close with the chairman calling for the gathering to sing the national anthem.

Tribunal Has Heavy Task

Port Elgin Tribunal have had a heavy task the past week. The summoning of the eligibles by the Registrar, not only brought to the tribunal the young man but in most cases, the fathers, as well.

With nearly every applicant appearing personally, the examination has proceeded slowly. On Saturday one case was that of a married man aged 49, for whom the wife asked exemption. Needless to say the Tribunal scored the case off the lists, but how it got past the Registrar is the conundrum. Another conundrum would be how any postoffice in our locality could misunderstand, the instructions, and still another conundrum is presented, when anyone who reads does not know that the first class called is only single men or widowers 20 to 34.

Following are the dispositions made by the Tribunal since Tuesday morning last.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Nov. 25, 1917. Lesson VIII.

A PSALM OF THANKSGIVING.

Psalm 103: 1-22.

Commentary.—I. Praise for personal blessings (vs. 1-5). 1. bless the Lord—"Bless Jehovah"—R. V. The word bless means to praise and adore, but it also expresses deep affection for the object of one's praise. O my soul—The psalmist addresses his real self, his immortal nature, and calls upon him to bless Jehovah. all that is within me—He makes it clear that his entire being should fall down in lowly adoration before God. his holy name—The "name" stands for all the nature and attributes of Jehovah. 2. forget not all his benefits—The psalmist is considering in these few verses the many mercies for which he desires to praise God. He recognizes a natural tendency to forget the favors which God abundantly bestows upon mankind, and demands that his soul shall not forget them. "All his benefits" is a comprehensive term and some of the items are included in the following verses. 3. forgiveth all thine iniquities—He begins his enumeration of benefits received with spiritual blessings. Iniquities include all departures from righteousness. The psalmist bears testimony to his freedom from condemnation, for all his sins were forgiven. healeth all thy diseases—David was praising the Lord, not only for forgiving his sins, or healing the malady of spiritual sickness, but for healing his body or for keeping him in health. The health we enjoy and the healing that comes to us are God's gifts to us. 4. redeemeth the life from destruction—To Jehovah is given praise for the preservation of the physical life in the midst of countless dangers; but beyond that is the redemption of the soul from spiritual and eternal death. There is an intimation also of the resurrection of the body in the last day. 5. satisfieth thy desire with good things (R. V.)—All the longings of the nature are filled in Jehovah whether those longings pertain to the soul or body. youth is renewed like the eagle's—Reference is made to the annual molting of this bird, after which it looks fresh and renewed.

II. The greatness of God's mercy (vs. 6-18). 6. executeth righteousness and judgment—The Lord does not favor the rich and high above those who are poor and despised. He does not show respect of persons. He administers justice and relieves the oppressed. 7. made known his ways unto Moses—He employed Moses as the one through whom he declared his will to the Israelites and to the world. his acts unto the children of Israel—By his miracles he showed his power and wisdom, and his love for his chosen people. 8. gracious—The Lord shows favor to sinners, who deserve no mercy at his hands. He grants the favor of pardon to those who repent and believe in him. 9. he will not always chide—The Lord rebukes and chastens men for their profit and not for his pleasure. He will cease his chastenings as soon as their purpose is accomplished. his anger—His displeasure. When men cease from sin, God's displeasure with them ends. 10. hath not dealt with us after our sins—God has not punished us as severely as we have deserved or we should long ago have been cut off beyond the hope of mercy. 11. as the heaven is high above the earth—How high heaven is above the earth no man can tell. Stars are known to be so distant that it requires four thousand years for their light to reach the earth, and light travels at the marvelous rate of 186,000 miles a second. 12. as far as the east is from the west—The comparison in v. 11 involves the unmeasured stretches of the heavens, and this employs the greatest distance pertaining to the earth.

13. As a father pitieth his children—This is another striking comparison that appeals to every one. We readily understand what a father's love for his child will lead him to do or suffer. God's pity for those who fear Him is like that of an earthly father, only it is the pity of One who is infinitely stronger and wiser and more loving. 14. he knoweth our frame—God takes into consideration our powers and our limitations. Remembereth that we are dust—Man was formed of dust and will return to dust, as far as the material body is concerned. He is weakness and frailty, and God has mercy upon him. 15. His days are as grass—The psalmist is here enlarging upon the weakness of man as set forth in vs. 14. "The grass lives, grows, flowers, falls beneath the scythe, dries up and is removed from the field: read this sentence over again, and you will find it the history of man." 16. He is gone—[illegible] quickly [illegible] as the grass [illegible] [illegible] flourish [illegible] wind [illegible] been forgotten. 17. But—A strong [illegible] everlasting [illegible] God's [illegible] 19. A call to bring [illegible] 20. [illegible] angels [illegible] commandments [illegible] hearkening [illegible] 21. All ye His hosts [illegible] ministers of His [illegible] 22. All His works [illegible] of His dominion [illegible] my soul.

Questions.—Of what is the Book of Psalms [illegible] [illegible] What personal blessings called forth praise to God from David? How is God's greatness shown? What comparison is used to show God's mercy? How far are the sins of the penitent removed from Him? How is man's frailty expressed? What is the climax of this psalm?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Spiritual meditation.

I. Upon blessings experienced.

II. Upon blessings enumerated.

I. Upon blessings experienced. This psalm is one of devotion. Memory, heart and will were employed in David's devotion. He exalted the Lord as the Fountain of all good, worthy of all praise and thanksgiving. His psalm is a stream of grateful praise, poured forth when his soul was moved to its utmost depths by the blessing which God had abundantly bestowed upon him. It is a psalm of of life, the experience of a throbbing heart and the exigencies of weakness and sin. It is a striking revelation of the being, character and purpose of God. It is also a clear portrayal of the origin, doings, needs, blessings and destiny of man. God called forth this tribute to Himself from a heart in which he dwelt. Finding his voice inadequate to give vent to his gratitude, the psalmist summoned a goodly choir, the workings of God, the angels of God and every living thing to accentuate the joyful strains and to make his praise glorious. He proclaimed universal, unreserved adoration. With the business of faith he spoke of the eternal One as standing in close relation to himself, of his soul and God as being in touch with each other. He was solicitous that his praise should be spiritual. He bade his own soul yield its whole self to the praise of God in a way pleasing to him. The psalm is a type of intelligent thanksgiving, an expression of purified emotion, based upon holy thoughts, the immediate acknowledgment of vast spiritual favors received. Jehovah's dominion is proclaimed as universal, founded upon his preservation of all things, strengthened by the innumerable benefits he bestows upon his believing children. His dominion, though absolute, is not tyrannical. After exhorting himself to praise the great God on account of the benefits which he had conferred, the psalmist gave general reasons why he and all men should bless his holy name.

II. Upon blessings enumerated. The psalmist specified certain causes for thanksgiving, the first of which is the forgiveness of sin, the key to this psalm. God first blesses man with pardon and then receives his praises for the gift. How he takes care of the disaster wrought by sin, he does not explain. It is plain that his mercy is so great that he forgives sin and then adds great favors and great privileges and enjoyments. Forgiveness is a perfect blessing, a priceless blessing, the crown of God's benefits. He loves to forgive sinners, to adopt them into his family and to cheer them with his promises. Knowledge of human frailty is the occasion of his compassion. Consciousness of the tender mercy enables the soul to exult in its deliverance. The pardon of sin comes first that it may be seen to be an act of pure grace. All mercies are the gifts of God, the purchase of infinite love. The acceptable return which can be made for them is gratitude, praise and service. Man's course is downward until he is divinely forgiven and healed and enabled to rise to heavenly places in the realms of divine grace. God is again and again presented as the source of strength, as the supreme cause of health. He provides suitable nutriment to sustain the powers he renews. He will proportion trials to man's endurance. He will not demand more service than man is capable of rendering. There is a spirit in man that can reverence the Infinite, that can keep his covenant and obey his precepts. God will not crown a man with loving kindness and tender mercies while he clings to his sins. Renewal is essential. God's mercy surpasses all the extent of human reason, human expectations, human sentiments and hopes. "It flows a spontaneous stream from an infinite fountain." It is the attribute in which Deity perfectly delights. God has trusted his world to demonstrate his wisdom, omnipotence and justice. The great purpose of divine revelation is to declare the mercy of God and lead needy humanity to accept it. "Mercy is the exercise of a divine benevolence in respect to a guilty being." There is much need of proclaiming the great truth that God can forgive sin.

IN CHRIST WITH GOD.

[illegible] the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me. [illegible] for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him which died for them, and rose again.—If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new. We are in Him that is true, even in His Son Jesus Christ.—As thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us.—Ye are the body of Christ, and members in particular.—Because I live, ye shall live also.

To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.

WORK.

"A ship once asked a man, "What shall I do?" And the man said, "Come to me, with spars and sails, with sound timbers and a good deck to turn the water, and I will tell you what to do. I will put cargo in the hold to keep you steady. I will put in provisions for the crew, charts, compass and chronometer. I will come on board and control, guide, and bring to destination."

A man once came to the Lord and asked, "What shall I do to work the works of God?" and the Lord said: "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent." That is, come, like the ship, empty, unoccupied; you shall be made clean inside and outside, have a wholesome cargo, intelligence on the quarter deck, safe guidance and a sure arrival. What the wind is to the sail God is to the soul. What the man is to the ship, God is to the man. Listen, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." He keepeth no Sabbath, never takes a rest. He ever worketh. Come to the wharf again; here is cargo piled up in the shed, here is the ship, well rigged, seaworthy, a presiding intelligence. Bring these together, the ship is nothing, the cargo is nothing, the presiding intelligence does it all. When the Lord said, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom He hath sent." He simply meant, come like a ship to her berth, and let God do the works, all of them, from first to the last. To come rightly to God is to come as the clay comes to the potter. Let God work in you to will and to do. When it is said, "Be filled with the Spirit," you have to remember, you do not fill yourself, but you allow yourself to be filled.

God is active, you are passive. I once saw a small ship taking in coal on the River Tyne. Twenty tons came down the spout at once. It was the sensation of the hour, it was an imperative moment, an importation from above. The ship trembled, moved, was conscious of a new burden. So, when God puts the Spirit into a man, he quivers, shakes, is renewed, steadied, employed and made glad. This is the way, there is no other. We are just to let God fill us, guide us, and bring us home. This is religion! "O that thou hadst hearkened to My commandment, then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." When we work so, we shall work restfully, energetically, confidently, victoriously, work in harmony with God, who worketh in His servants mightily.

Orchard and Garden

Quite a large number of people are becoming convinced that the idea of fall planting is a better one than was usually supposed a few years ago. Recent experiments have shown that in some cases and under some conditions fall planting of nursery stock is better practice and will be productive of more satisfactory results than spring planting.

Most of our hardier tree fruits can be fall planted with success, provided however that trees can be obtained from the nursery which are sufficiently matured to be dug, shipped to the grower and planted early enough. Some of the bush fruits, such as currants and gooseberries, do better when fall planted than when spring planted, because they start to grow so early in the spring that it is sometimes difficult to get them planted early enough.

As a general rule, however, spring planting is still preferred, partly because the merits of fall planting have not been sufficiently demonstrated and because growers are so used to spring planting that they hesitate to experiment with plants of doubtful maturity.

One great mistake made by men who wish to plant out an orchard, whether it be large or small, is that they wait until nearly the time for planting before ordering stock from the nursery. Nurserymen follow the practice of "first come, first served," and the dissatisfaction often experienced by growers who do not get the varieties they order, is frequently due to the fact that their orders came in late and the varieties ordered were all sold. Most nurserymen reserve to themselves the right to substitute in such cases, other varieties of similar character for the unavailable ones and growers are frequently incensed at this practice, warning of which can usually be found in the catalogues of the nurseries. If no substitutes are desired, the order sheet should say so; much unpleasantness would in this way often be avoided.

Fruit growers who are planning to plant out orchards of any size, even to half an acre, should secure catalogues from several nurseries so that prices may be compared and so that the best trees will be obtained. Every nurseryman of any importance uses a catalogue and will be pleased to send one on request. These catalogues should be secured now if they have not already been written for and the order sent in as early as possible.

MAKING APPLE BUTTER.

Who is there who does not like apple butter, or cider apple sauce, as it is sometimes called? In some sections of the country nearly every farmer will make his own supply of this delicious by-product. Occasionally one finds a person to whom this excellent dish is a stranger, but most people are acquainted with at least the commercial product if not the home made.

The best cooking apples as a rule are the most satisfactory for making apple butter. Such well known and standard varieties as Northern Spy and Rhode Island Greening, for example, make excellent samples as do King and other varieties of good cooking reputation. Overripe apples should not be used, as they tend to destroy the high flavor for which apple butter is best liked. A little vinegar added when the apples are necessarily overripe, will help this deficiency.

Only fresh sweet cider should be used and it is common practice to take the apples to the nearest cider mill just previous to the time when the boiling is to take place so that the cider will be quite fresh when used. It takes a long time to boil the apples and cider and usually occupies the greater part of a day. The cider is usually boiled down to about half its original volume when the apples are added. The proportions of apples and cider used should be about equal so that the quantity of apples used will be equal to the original quantity of cider before boiling down.

The product must be constantly stirred while in the making and the boiling takes from four to six hours. Sugar is sometimes used, but this is a matter of taste, as is also the matter of spicing. Boiling is stopped when the apples and the cider no longer separate and when the mixture has reached the proper thickness. This is determined by cooling small lots in a saucer at frequent intervals until it reaches the consistency of apple sauce. Immediately after boiling, the apple butter should be packed away in sealers or in sterilized stone jars or crocks.

Apple butter may be made without cider by the addition of water to the apples and the use of brown rather than white sugar.

WINTER KILLING OF GRAPES.

Winter killing of fruit plants is a serious question among fruit growers nearly every year, and there is no known way of preventing it except by the most intelligent cultural practices known and as full a knowledge as possible regarding the habits and the methods of growth of the fruit plant in question.

Quite a large number of grape vines die down every year and numbers of them never recover. Undoubtedly the most important factor in the winter killing of grapes, as in the winter injury of most other fruits, is the immaturity of the vines when they are brought face to face with the severe tests of a cold winter. The vagaries of winter are hard on human beings and they are no less hard on the tender tissues of the plant which may be sent into winter condition in an unnecessarily tender condition because of the laxity of a careless cultivator.

The energies of the vine are probably devoted to the ripening of the fruit as long as this remains in an immature condition on the vine. Thus the ripening of the wood and the buds is left until the short period which elapses between the harvest of the fruit and the cessation of growth due to the cold weather. If the crop has been a large one, and no steps have been taken by the fruit grower to hasten the ripening of the buds and the wood before the fruit needs all the energies of the vine, it is quite likely that there is not sufficient strength left in the vine to finish the maturing of the buds, with the result that they are more easily killed by the winter.

The bud of the grape is compound, consisting frequently of three buds, enclosed within the same bud scales. One of these, the primary bud, is for the purpose of producing fruit, the second for the purpose of growing wood, and the third is in the nature of an auxiliary which expands in case the others are destroyed. If winter killing destroys the primary bud, and possibly the secondary one also, the third or auxiliary bud may still expand and give rise to the impression that no fruit buds were formed because of food exhaustion.—Canadian Countryman.

BURDEN OF WORRY.

To-day's Enough; Never Mind Yesterday's or To-morrow's.

A wayfarer carried a heavy sack, under which he toiled and complained unceasingly. From none could he get help or comfort.

And as he slowly journeyed, groaning under his burden, the Angel of Opportunism came to him and spoke kindly, saying:

"Brother, what carriest thou?"

The man answered surlily, "My worries."

The angel smiled pityingly upon him and said, "Let us look into thy burden and examine they worries."

And so they looked in. But lo, the sack was empty.

"Why surely!" cried the man, "there were two great worries, too heavy for man to bear; But—ah, yes, I had forgotten—one was a worry of yesterday, and so it is gone."

"And the other?"

"That—why, that was a worry of to-morrow, and it—it has not yet yet come."

Then the angel smiled with infinite pity, saying:

"Hearken. He who bows himself down under the worries of yesterday and to-morrow wears himself out for naught. Be he who carries only the worries of to-day has no need of a sack for his sorrows. If thou wilt cast this black thing aside and give all thy strength and cheer and courage to the things of to-day real misfortune never can burden thee."

Wondering, the man did as the angel commanded.

And as he took up his journey and went lightly, swiftly on, his heart and his hands were free to relieve many a brother wayfarer of his burdens and to pluck sweet fruits and flowers along the wayside.

And when he came at last to the settling of the sun it was with smiles and a song.—Christian Herald.

Through Many Trials

CHAPTER XXIV.

The next moment she has recalled Evelyn's speech, her insinuations, her malicious little smiles, and coarse little jests, and her heart beats fiercely, hot with wrath, and her bright smile fades.

"You here, Mr. Dumaresq!" she exclaims, in a tone of cold surprise, "Then I was not mistaken—you were in Oldington Gardens this morning?"

"Yes, Miss Trefusis. I thought—I ventured to hope, at least—that you recognized me?" he says, questioningly, and his face darkens, and the voice that falters a little is very proud and cold.

"Oh, yes," she says, carelessly, only her eyes are downcast, and the color is ebbing and flowing in her cheeks; "I saw you. Walking past the house, were you not? I thought I could not be mistaken. I hope you are quite well."

"I am quite well," thank you," he says, very quietly, with a slight, conventional smile, but all eagerness and anxiety have died out of his low, even voice, and his face has visibly paled under the bronze of his skin.

"I hope you are quite well, Miss Trefusis, and Mr. Lionel and Sir Philip?"

He speaks to her in his old, quiet, deferential way, as if he were still a dependent of her father's household; and Imogene struggles hard to keep up her hauteur and coldness by mentally repeating Evelyn's assurances.

"Thank you, they are very well," she says, mechanically, and then, recollecting herself suddenly, she adds, impulsively: "No, no, I am forgetting. Poor Lionel is not well, Mr. Dumaresq; he is getting very bad, Aunt Althea says."

"Indeed?" he asks, with quick interest. "What do you mean by getting bad? Getting rather violent and unmanageable?"

"So Aunt Althea says," Imogene answers, with despair in her tone and in the wistful look in her great, beautiful eyes which are dewy with tears. "I am afraid she [illegible] you know, will consent to put him somewhere under restraint—"

She cannot get a word farther. Her lips are quivering so, and she looks appealingly in Dumaresq's face with a piteous appeal, dimly feeling he can help her if no one else will.

"So this is why I am going home," she concludes. "I have been staying with my sister, Lady Petherick."

"Yes, I know," Dumaresq says, absently, scarcely knowing what he is saying in the pleasure and sadness, the despair and delight, with which he looks on her for these few fleeting moments: this fair young rose of womanhood, to whom he has given the first, best, strongest love of his life.

For never has he seen her look so fair, so winsome, so virginal and altogether lovely as she looks at this moment, with the dark blue cushioned and carpeted compartment of the railway carriage for a background to her pretty girlish figure, daintily arrayed in a delicate, pale-brown costume, which is of cloth-like material, with linings of pale gold-color satin gleaming out here and there, long, pale, fawn peau de suede gloves, ruffles of snowy crepe lisse high and full about the rounded, pearly throat, and above the ripples and baby curls of her brown hair is a bewitchingly delicate, coquettishly modest bonnet-like hat, or hat-like bonnet, of roughish white straw, lined inside with puffings of palest corn tulle, in which are placed, like the tiny syringa or [illegible] like, remarkably like, orange blossoms.

And the hat—straw-colored [illegible] the bonnet is tied down with a wide [illegible] scarf of the same pale-yellow tulle, resting in a great fluffy bow under the dimpled little white chin.

It is altogether a costume à ravir, as our French friends effectively and concisely describe it, but the gypsy, bride-like chapeau is simply perfection.

Imogene herself had chosen attire much plainer and darker, and more suitable for a long railway journey, but Lady Petherick utterly overruled her decision, and superintended her toilet herself with affectionate interest, answering all Imogene's remonstrances with sisterly authoritativeness.

"I want Aunt Althea and papa to see what I have made of you in this little time," she says, triumphantly; "you were nothing but a pale, awkward little rustic when you came up to my wedding, and now dressed like that, I should not be ashamed to introduce you to the best people in London!"

So Imogene wears her pretty dress and bonnet, both gifts from Lady Petherick's full purse, and thinks gratefully of her sister's generosity, and never dreams that the attire she is in is as much part and parcel of one of beautiful Evelyn's [illegible] schemes as is her journey home, the lying letter that has terrified her, and the elaborate "faint praise" which damns," of Dick Dumaresq.

"Yes, I know," he says, a vague suspicion rising up in his thoughts. "Lady Petherick told me herself when I met her this morning; by the by she said Saturday."

"Who said?" demands Imogene, staring at him unbelievingly.

"Your sister, Lady Petherick," he answers, slowly, his vague suspicions strengthening. "I met her this morning, just after I left Oldington Gardens; she was riding, and she reined up and accosted me."

"Evelyn did?" Imogene reiterates.

"Yes," Dumaresq answers, earnestly, "she was most kind and cordial to me and invited me to dine at her house next Tuesday."

"Next Tuesday!" Imogene repeats, bewildered, her eyes dilating, her brow lined with pain from a sickening fear which she resolutely banishes in a moment—that horrible, impossible as it is—she had almost believed in that moment that Evelyn was behaving treacherously to her, was lying to her, and plotting against her.

"Next Tuesday," Dumaresq says, gravely.

He sees in a moment that he has contrived, in all ignorance and all unwittingly, to let in light on some elaborate piece of sisterly plotting whose aim, as far as he can imagine, is to keep him from meeting Imogene.

"And she said you were returning on Saturday," he concludes; and then, as Imogene lifts her startled eyes to his he reads there her belief in her sister's duplicity, and doubt creeps into her own mind, and her brain whirls.

She crimsons painfully, and sits quite still, with drooping eyelids and fast-throbbing heart until Richard Dumaresq says, quietly, as he leans against the jamb of the carriage door, looking at her with hopeless, stern eyes, his passion [illegible] repressed:

"She was unaware that I should have any chance of meeting you, I suppose." Then, after a long pause: "She was quite right; she knows the world, you see, and she was very kind and cordial toward me. I must feel most grateful to her—friendless, penniless and—an outcast beyond the gilded pale of society as I am—she gave me permission to look on her as a friend, promised me invitations to her parties and introductions among her friends. Nothing could have been kinder than her manner was," he adds, gratefully still, but a little uneasily and thoughtfully.

Then Imogene turns on him with a flame of jealous wrath blazing in her gray eyes, and her soft, fair face rigid, strong, womanly in passionate emotion.

"You would scarcely have said so, or considered Lady Petherick as so kind and generous a friend," she exclaims, hotly, "if you had heard the way in which she spoke of you to me!"

"As a mauvais sujet?" he asks, with a slight smile.

"Yes, and—and a dangerous sort of person," Imogene stammers, rather wishing she had left this subject untouched, only her heart is throbbing so with indignation and with hurt feeling that she must speak.

"She never said she had [illegible] you [illegible] she invited you to her dinner party next Tuesday," she says, [illegible] affected [illegible]

"Did she not?" Dumaresq says [illegible]. "Nevertheless, Miss Trefusis, I am sure you [illegible] have spoken the truth."

[illegible]

"I beg your pardon," she says [illegible] "It only seems that I [illegible] much at my sister not having told me [illegible] opinions of you [illegible] and your cousin Captain Dumaresq."

"And my cousin Captain Dumaresq's [illegible] of the dangerous sort of person [illegible]" Dumaresq says, [illegible] through a sort of spasm [illegible] his face, and the color burns [illegible] in his cheeks. "I have discovered that my cousin, Captain Dumaresq, is a far cleverer fellow than I ever gave him credit for being. His [illegible] and [illegible] anything I have ever [illegible] from him."

Imogene is looking at him with [illegible] of innocent surprise and [illegible] questioning.

"I dare say it was he who told Evelyn all these stories," she falters, [illegible] at him in the hope to hear him contradict them every one.

"What stories?" Dumaresq asks, curtly. "Stories of my profligacy and villainy, eh?"

Poor Imogene's face is crimson to her little shell-like ears.

MOTHERHOOD WOMAN'S JOY

Suggestions to Childless Women.

Among the virtues of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is the ability to correct sterility in the cases of many women. This fact is well established as evidenced by the following letter and hundreds of others we have published in these columns.

Poplar Bluff, Mo.—"I want other women to know what a blessing Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has been to me. We had always wanted a baby in our home but I was in poor health and not able to do my work. My mother and husband both urged me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I did so, my health improved and I am now the mother of a fine baby girl and do all my own house work."—Mrs. Alta B. Timmons, 216 Almond St., Poplar Bluff, Mo.

In many other homes, once childless, there are now children because of the fact that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound makes women normal, healthy and strong.

"They, or rather Evelyn—but I suppose it was he who told her," she says, with feminine unfairness, "that you had been very wild—[illegible]—a rake, Evelyn said."

She has a very dim idea of what a rake may mean, except that it describes a condition of terrific iniquity, and she is hot with shame and embarrassment as she stops hopelessly in the thick of the subject, dreadfully frightened and abashed beneath the mesmeric gaze of Dumaresq's eyes, which are fixed on her.

"That I was a rake, eh?" he says, slowly, talking as if partly to himself. "Now which is it, to Captain Dumaresq or Lady Petherick that I am indebted for that flight of fancy. To Lady Petherick I feel tolerably sure. Captain Dumaresq played his trump card long ago, when he went down to Porthcreath to warn Sir Philip against me. Then it is to guard you from the vicinity of the rake that your sister sends you summarily home, your mind filled with evil tales of me, even while she extends her own gracious favor to me—why, I am sure I cannot at present imagine!"

He draws a long, deep breath, looking at Imogene with a half-sad, half-[illegible], wholly passionate gaze.

"I have no right to stand here and talk to you like this—no earthly right!" he mutters. "I shall have no need in shaping your future, my darling!"

She looks up startled at the passionate [illegible], and though he will not suffer himself to see it, he knows that all her innocent young heart is glowing in her eyes and trembling on her soft, parted lips for him.

She shrinks a little from his [illegible] gaze, but in the very shrinking leans a little nearer to him and dares not look up at him, and in those few, fleeting moments her whole soul's allegiance goes over to him and turns away from her sister she had loved so dearly and trusted so entirely—forever.

"I have no right to dare to place myself in your regard as a lover, even if a hopeless one," he says, in a low, hoarse, suppressed way. "But you know I loved you—always, and an honest, intense love is neither a harm nor a shame to a princess if even from a peasant, and they—your father, your sister, your friend—might have left me so much kindness and regard as your tender, true heart gave me. They need not have tried to make you blush to remember that I forgot myself once—for those two or three minutes that will last me while I live. My darling," he whispers, hoarsely, "for that you are—that you will be as long as I live—nothing can uproot or prevent that; my darling and the love of my soul [illegible]—Imogene, I kissed you!"

Imogene makes no verbal reply, but the [illegible] flush that overspreads her face seems meet for the bride-white blossoms above her brown hair.

"You know I kissed you," he whispers. "My darling, my [illegible] I held you in my arms and kissed you, do you think I would have dared to do that [illegible] I don't think I should [illegible] hardened or reprobate! I told you the truth, sweetest, dearest, as they tell you at this moment, that, except for my poverty, there was no reason why I should not try to win you [illegible] all [illegible] my heart. No reason, Imogene, except what the world counts the greatest reason of all—poverty. [illegible] place [illegible] in the [illegible] of the world, and place you as far beyond me as the stars."

CHAPTER XXV.

He says it quite quietly, in the utter, aching hopelessness, looking at the sweet, fresh young face of his goddess.

"As far beyond me as the stars, I know that well," he repeats. "Long before I could hope for such a [illegible] in a position to [illegible] will have passed over your [illegible] you will be married and [illegible]—forever [illegible] and I shall be [illegible] but I dare say [illegible] me, as a selfish scoundrel who took advantage of the position in which he was placed. That is how they will all teach you to regard me," he concludes. "But, as Heaven hears me, Imogene, I am nothing worse than a rough, plain man, who loves you as well as ever a woman was loved, and who honors, reveres you as much as he loves you! Now, good-by! I had better go at once, before my foolish tongue runs on any further. Good-by! As Heaven hears me, I have spoken the truth, and nothing but the truth, to you! I love you, and I shall love you to my dying day. Do let me have the comfort of thinking that you do not dislike or despise me! Farewell!" he says, huskily, with a sad, wistful smile, while his brilliant eyes are clouded with a mute anguish such as you may see in the eyes of a sorrowing, dumb creature.

"You may come down to Cornwall sometimes?" she says, questioningly.

"Yes, sometimes," he answers.

"But—soon?" Imogene persists. "We shall be so glad to see you, Lionel and I, at least."

"No, not soon," he says, briefly, the slight, sorrowful smile growing more wistful.

"But," Imogene says again, looking up in his face with a swift, bashful entreaty, and struggling violently with her words lest they choke her, "you might—when I ask you."

He starts, and flushes a little, for a moment.

"Because you ask me," he says, smiling, though the flush fades. "That is why I cannot—must not come. 'That way madness lies.' When I feel it is safe for me to come—in five or six years' time—when you have almost forgotten me, and your life is full of new interests and pleasures—until then, good-by, Miss Trefusis!"

He presses the little hand in its soft pretty glove, which has lain in his all this time; he cannot quite prevent the pressure from being "close and kind," and draws back from the carriage door a pace or two, while the fair, small oval face, the grieved, [illegible] lips, and the big gray eyes clouded with tears looked at him with a [illegible] little smile that struggles hard to make itself a calm, self-possessed smile.

For with these few parting words he has put himself miles apart from her, made himself years older, wiser, colder than she is—lets the hard, chill barriers of the world, and life, and years of absence sunder every bond of their spirits—alas, already wedded to each other fond and true!—and all the sweet, magnetic sympathies between them.

"You—you promised to come back!" [illegible] a half-choking voice, and the pitiful little smile is quite drowned in tears.

"Yes, I know I did," he says, with a short fierce laugh, he is so tortured by the sight of her tears and her unmistakable disappointment and pain;

"And perhaps a little girlish, romantic tenderness for me that I must take care to crush at once," he adds, mentally. "I was fool enough that evening for anything!" he says, bitterly, continuing, "I was smarting so beneath a sense of wrong and insult, and your father's treatment of me had stirred up every evil passion, and your sweet courtesy and sympathy turned my brain! I was between two minds whether I wouldn't steal you there and then!" and he laughs convulsively.

"Steal me!" Imogene says; and there is something pleasant in this utterly honest announcement to her as well as to him, for the sweet, drowned eyes begin to sparkle, and the quivering red lips curve into a hidden smile.

"Yes: snatch you down out of your arbor, and take you in my arms on the saddle before me, and ride away with you—a sort of young Lochinvar business!" he says, his bright, handsome face aglow with passionate delight and humor at the very thought, and Imogene looks at him, and the fire of his passion flushes her fair, pale face; her eyes glow and flash like jewels from under dark, wet lashes.

"Why didn't you?" she asks, with a low soft laugh.

"Because I could never give you back again," he says, gravely, his ardent gaze fixed on her with a half melancholy tenderness. "I should have linked your fate to mine forever then; I could never give you back again."

And she looks up at him with a sort of terror of delight and [illegible] in her half-veiled eyes, and [illegible] swift blushes which the [illegible] have it [illegible] hotly.

"I should not have wanted you to give me back again," she murmurs, softly, her eyelashes touching her soft cheeks, and the slender, daintily gloved hand, in its pale chamois glove, moves along the ledge of the carriage door, with a swift involuntary motion, until it touches his arm, and rests there.

"Do you mean that?" he asks, with a sudden smile, half playing, half passionate, "Would you have been willing to come to me and share my lot whatever it was? To take me for better, for worse, for the rest of your days? Would you?"

"Yes, you mean," Imogene says, so confused and [illegible] are her thoughts that she blunders [illegible] into a perfect maze of [illegible]

[illegible]

"[illegible] I mean that exactly," he says [illegible], still in the [illegible] is the sweetest and best after all! Would you be willing to marry me if I had asked you that August evening?"

Ontario's Fruit for Overseas

Despite the great shortage of all fruits in the Province, the Government has determined that our men in the hospitals shall receive the best that we have in even larger quantities. Our Agent General in London, England, was asked for 25 per cent. more than 1916 to meet the increased needs in Great Britain and France, and has been promised that the requirements, totaling some 2,050,000 pounds, shall be supplied.

Of this quantity, some 500,000 pounds will consist of canned fruits and jams, and will all be put up at the Vineland Experiment Station in the small experimental [illegible]. The package exclusively used is the gallon sanitary can which requires no solder for the cap. This can makes an ideal size for hospital use.

Already the following quantities have been put up, and are awaiting shipment:

Strawberry jam	3,500 gals.
Raspberry jam	3,250 gals.
Black currant jam	2,250 gals.
Blackberry jam	2,200 gals.
Canned sour cherries	2,250 gals.
Other canned fruits	250 gals.
Jellies	225 gals.

The heaviest part of the pack will be, as in 1916, canned peaches, with a considerable quantity of plums and pears. The factory is now running night and day on these fruits, the season for which being considerably later than last year.

Apples—The remainder of the shipment, some 1,200,000 pounds, or 22,000 boxes, of apples, will be put up by the Fruit Branch, very largely in Eastern Ontario. Owing to the failure of the crop in the West and North from which most of the fruit came in 1916, only some two or three cars will be packed in these districts. About 12,000 boxes have been purchased in Prince Edward county and 15,000 in Northumberland and Durham. These will be largely packed at Wellington, Brighton and Newcastle, [illegible] sent to the seaboard for storage until boat space is available. Owing to the embargo on all fresh fruit, this shipment will likely constitute the only Canadian fruit sent overseas during the shipping season of 1917-18, a truly remarkable record, considering the enormous trade in this commodity in past years.

Despite the German submarine blockade of the British Isles, the losses have been very light, only two shipments totalling some fifty thousand boxes having been lost since the war broke out. Of this quantity twenty-five hundred boxes were on a steamer sunk in the middle of the Atlantic by one of the German commerce raiders last year. This shows only 1½ per cent. loss from submarine activity and is a striking example of the protection afforded our commerce by the British navy.

Owing to the scarcity of apples in the centre of the Province, the Red Cross Society has appealed to the Ontario Government for some ten car loads of low grade fruit for their fruit kitchen at Hamilton. This fruit is essential to the making up of the large quantities of jams and jellies shipped by the society from Hamilton to their distributing offices in London, England. The Fruit Branch has been entrusted with the securing of the supply, which will necessarily have to be obtained this year in the eastern [illegible] counties.

SOLDIERS' FUEL

Italy and France Are Making "Ration-Heaters."

A new use for old newspapers and candle-ends has been found in Europe. They are used to make what the Italians call scalda-rancio (ration-heaters), which are now prepared by the million by women and children and sent to the troops in places where coal cannot be used—in the high Alps, for instance. The old papers are rolled tightly, the edges pasted down, and the rolls then boiled in paraffin. A patriotic society in Italy is delivering these rolls to the government at the rate of [illegible] and the old newspapers are being used up for this purpose so fast that they are becoming very expensive, says a writer in "The National Geographic Magazine."

"In America there are still millions of candle-ends and thousands of tons of newspapers scattered over the country, and it would seem to be well worth while for the thousands of willing hands in the homes to convert them into these most useful ration-heaters for the boys at the front, or for their use next winter in the training-camps, or even for use at home, where they can take the place of the more expensive solid alcohol or replace kindlings in the kitchen stove.

"It is the easiest thing imaginable to make ration-heaters, or scalda-rancio, as they are called in Italy, if one follows the directions of the National Italian society.

"Spread out four newspapers, eight sheets in all, and begin rolling at the long edge. Roll as tightly as possible until the papers are half rolled, then fold back the first three sheets toward the rolled part and continue to wrap around the roll almost to the first fold then fold back another three sheets and continue to wrap around the roll again up to the last margin of the paper. On this margin, consisting of two sheets, spread a little glue or paste and continue the rolling, so as to make a compact roll of paper almost like a torch. If six of the sheets are not turned under, there will be too many edges to glue.

"While the newspapers may be cut along the line of the columns before rolling and the individual columns rolled separately, as is done in the making of the trench-candles in France, it is easier to roll the whole newspaper into a long roll and then cut it into short lengths. A sharp carving knife, a pair of pruning shears or an old-fashioned hay-cutter will cut the rolls easily. These little rolls must then be boiled for four minutes in enough paraffin to cover them and then taken out and cooled, when they are ready to be put in bags, and sent to the front. If there are more newspapers than candle-ends, black paraffin can be bought for a few cents at any grocery.

"Little children and grown-ups in Italy and France are rolling, gluing and paraffining these ration-heaters by the million, and their fathers and husbands in places where wood and coal cannot be sent are cooking their rations over them."—Literary Digest.

RHEUMATISM CURED

In the days of our fathers and grandfathers rheumatism was thought to be the unavoidable penalty of middle life and old age. Almost every elderly person had rheumatism, as well as many young people. Medical science did not understand the trouble—did not know that it was rooted in the blood. It was thought that rheumatism was the direct effect of exposure to cold and damp, and it was treated with liniments and hot applications, which sometimes gave temporary relief, but did not cure the trouble. In those days there were [illegible] of rheumatic cripples. Now, medical science understands that rheumatism is a disease of the blood, and that with good, rich, red blood any man or woman of any age can drive rheumatism out by killing the poison in the blood which causes it. There are many elderly people who have never felt a twinge of rheumatism, and many who have conquered it by simply keeping their blood rich and pure. The blood-making, blood-enriching qualities of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills is becoming every year more widely known, and it is the more general use of these pills that has robbed rheumatism of its terrors. At the first sign of thin blood, which is shown by loss of appetite, palpitations, dull skin and dim eyes, protect yourself against the further ravages of disease by taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. They have cured thousands of people—if you give them a fair trial they will not disappoint you.

You can get these pills through any dealer in medicine or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Old Plea That Wearing Glasses [illegible]

[illegible] no longer a mark of advanced age; it is not a sufficient excuse for a lady to say that glasses would make her look old.

Moreover, wearing glasses is one of the best preservers of a youthful appearance. This is because prolonged eye strain causes wrinkles to appear, [illegible] and give the countenance [illegible] tired, drawn, frowning, which is very characteristic, and is far more to be avoided from the point of view of appearance than the slight disfigurement of glasses.

Indeed, so far from being unbecoming, there are some types of face to which glasses just add the finishing touch.—Charles Phelps Cushing in World's Work.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

Thousands of gallant Canadian lads have been wounded the past ten days, and many killed. Yet some people wonder why it is necessary to send reinforcements.

This is no time to look for especial places to do your bit to win this war. The opportunities are many every day, and the fighting is good all along the line. Don't look for a special place. Just pitch in anywhere.

This is no time to argue what Britain needs most. We do know that she needs everything we can possibly do every hour, day and night. There is no room for contentious people. Service to our Empire is the standard by which we are measured.

Canada is in the war. We must either carry it on with men and money or back out. With Italy sore pressed and Russia looking to peace, the allied armies are in great need, and the colonies of Great Britain must shoulder greater responsibilities. Canada with 400,000 sons at the front can no more think of abandoning them than can the people of the Mother Land, their brave, who have suffered so much If Great Britain for one moment ceased the vigilance she has kept with her ships and her sailors, Canada would be lost to the enemy.

The Union Government has done some good. Word comes from Ottawa that an Order in Council has been passed to the effect that after the 30th of November no grain of any kind, and no food stuff of any sort, shall be used in the Dominion of Canada for the distillation of potable liquors. The saving which the new order may be expected to effect may be seen from the statement that during the year ending with 31st of March, 1917, the aggregate of barley, corn, rye, oats, wheat, sugar, rice, molasses, etc., used in brewing and distilling, amounted to more than one hundred and sixty-four millions of pounds.

Young Women To Help

Last Thursday evening, a goodly number of the young ladies in the town met together in the Library, for the purpose of organizing a society to aid Red Cross work. The following were elected to office: President, Miss Lulu Darling; Secretary, Miss Myrtle McLaren; Treasurer, Miss Pearl Izzard. A programme of work has been outlined for the winter months the Red Cross Society supplying all materials for sewing and knitting, and the articles when finished will be turned over to the Society and packed in the regular boxes of hospital supplies. There will be a membership fee of 25 cents and all those not belonging to other clubs or societies engaged in patriotic duties are invited to come and assist in this splendid work.

Of the numbers of British troops engaged in the war, 70 per cent are English, 8 per cent. Scotch, 6 per cent. Irish, and 16 per cent. from Canada, Australasia, India, etc. But of the Casualties up to date 76 per cent were the English troops.

TIVERTON

Intended for last week

The late John Dewar, who died at his home here on Wednesday last was buried in the Tiverton cemetery on Saturday. Mr. Dewar was one of the oldest residents in these parts. He was an esteemed elder of Knox church and had passed his 93nd birthday. He leaves a son John in the west and three daughters Misses Mary and Annie of Tiverton and Miss Jessie of Ottawa. Mr. Smyth of Strathroy, attended the funeral. Services were conducted in the church.

Miss Manda McKim left on Saturday for Detroit where she has secured a good situation.

D. B. McDonald and A. Nelson started out bright and early Monday morning in quest of purchasers of Victory Bonds.

Mr. James Begg of Greenock is threshing on the B. Line.

Mr. John Campbell and Mrs. Grunder on 10th Kincardine Tp., had enough threshing to keep McLean Bros' machine hustling for over a week. Mr. Crawford has, it is said, over four thousand bushels, about one thousand of which is wheat.

Gravel evenly spread and in a straight line greatly improves the appearance of a road.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Johnston and family moved to Guelph last week.

Mrs. L. Bell and family, 2nd of Bruce, have moved to London for the winter.

Merchants who helped the farmers with their harvest naturally look for fair consideration from farmers.

The proclamations were posted last week. The omission of Tiverton, necessitated many extaa miles for the posters to make repairs. Who pays the shot?

Mr. McAuley of Wiarton was in Tiverton last week. He was brought out as a Liberal standard bearer at a fully represented Liberal convention favorable to conscription when necessary. He now declares himself in favor of the Union government without consulting his Liberal friends. Does he now think conscription is necessary. Who knows but before nomination day he may want to ride a Conservative horse.

Necessary Farm Equipment

MORE and more the Ford car is looked upon by progressive farmers as necessary farm equipment, the same as the plow, the hay-rake, the drill, the mower, the harrow and other labor and time-saving machinery.

A farmer with a Ford car can dispense with one or two of his horses and make the trips to town, railway station, creamery, or to the neighbours in one-third the time. In fact there is no farm machine made that will save the busy farmer and his busy wife so much valuable time as a Ford. And it's so easy to take care of—far easier than a horse. No bed to make, or hay and oats to get, no harnessing and unharnessing, and no stables to clean. The Ford practically takes care of itself.

Ask any farmer who owns a Ford if he would ever again try to get along without it. His answer will hasten your decision to own one.

United Brethren Convention

The North Bruce U. B. church entertained the Annual U. B. Ministerial, Sunday School and Christian Endeavor Conventions of Ontario Conferences, Nov. 3-5th. The Conventions proved a great success. Quite a number of preachers and lay delegates were present from outside points.

The first day Nov. 3, was taken up by Ministerial Association. "The Fundamentals of the U. B. in Christ", by Rev. C. W. Backus, New Dundee. "The Successful Revival", by Rev. Geo. A. Shepherdson, Stevensville. The Pastor in his Study", by Rev. S. S. Lautenschlager, Kitchener. The Value of the Prayer meeting", by Rev. S. H. Swartz were among the helpful papers read. These topics brought out lively and helpful discussions.

In the evening Rev. J. W. Burton, of Huntington, Ind., preached a rousing sermon on the subject, "The Faith of our Fathers".

Saturday Nov. 3rd was taken up by the Sunday School Convention. Many vital S. S. problems were brought before the convention, and ably discussed. Among the papers given were "Sunday School and Evangelism" by Rev. James Hope, Roseville, "Best Methods of Teaching the Lesson", by Miss Albert, Kitchener. Organizations of the S. S." by Rev. J. W. Burton, Huntington. "The value of a Teachers Training Course" by F. A. Shantz, Kitchener. "Sunday School and the church", by Miss Dora Hallman, Mannheim", were among the splendid papers given.

The convention was favored by having present Rev. J. W. Burton, Huntington, Ind. general Secretary U. B. Sunday Schools, whose presence and helpful suggestions, added much to the inspiration and benefit of the conventions.

The evening sermon was preached by Rev. Geo. A. Shepherdson.

The Sunday services were attended by large and appreciative audiences. A special S. School service was held in the afternoon, in which prominent S. School workers addressed the school. Following the S. S. was a church service. Rev. A. B. Bowman, Alma, Mich. preached to a full house on "Power for Service" followed by communion services.

The evening service was in charge of Rev. C. W. Backus, New Dundee, a former pastor of the U. B. churches here.

Monday Nov. 5th was Christian Endeavor Day, Rev. A. B. Bowman, general secretary of U. B. C. E Societies, was present. Among the good papers given were' Opportunities of Soul winning in C. E. work" by Mr. Asa Hahn, Sherkstone. "Present Day Evils of the Drink and Tobacco Habits", by Miss McIntee and Miss Brigey, Mannheim. "What part can the C. E. Society take in the problem of re-construction after this war", was ably given by E. B. Hallman, New Dundee. "How to prevent Spiritual growth in C. E. Societies" by Miss Detweiler Centreville, "Timely Hints to Leaders", Mrs. James Hope, Roseville. "The Christian Endeavorer as a Sunday school worker", Mr. R. F. Thamer, were well given.

The series of conventions closed with the Monday evening service when Rev. S. S. Lautenschlager B. A., Kitchener, gave a powerful patriotic address.

The splendid way in which the meetings were carried out was a tribute to the work of the local pastor, Rev. Mr. Hallman, who worked hard and succeeded in making the convention a fine success.

Among the delegates and visitors were, Rev. C. W Backus, New Dundee: Rev. Geo. A Shepherdson, Stevensville: Rev. S. S. Lautenschlager, Kitchener: Rev. S. H Swartz, Kitchener: Rev. J. W. Burton, Huntington, Ind: Rev. A. B. Bowman, Alma, Mich. : Mr. Asa Hahn, Sherkston : Mr. E. B. Hallman, Miss Biegeman, New Dundee : Miss Hilborn, Roseville : Misses Hallman, Bergey, Eckbard, C and P. Hickert, of Mannheim, Williamsburg:

BORN—On Wednesday Oct. 31st to Mr. and Mrs. John Nickason, a daughter.

Mr. Reuben Plant has returned home after spending a few weeks at Stratford.

Mr. Ed. Gingrich spent Sunday at North Bruce.

Farmers are making good use of the fine weather in storing the roots and corn.

The ladies of the this division are busy getting ready to pack the Christmas boxes for the soldiers. Quite a number of well filled boxes are to be sent. These ladies are doing good work, and it is good when one can stand with square shoulders and say, "I am trying to do my part."

The ditchers are still busy in this section.

Mr. Allan McDonald who has been in the west for five months, has returned home smiling and happy. Glad to see you back, Allan.

We are sorry to report that Mrs. Miller is still in a very critical condition.

Messrs Grant and Poole from Mount Hope visited the Sunday School on Sunday, the latter speaking on the Religious Census which is to be taken shortly.

This community was very much grieved when word was received last week that Lieut. J. R. Geddes was wounded and died while at the dressing station. Lieut. Geddes was greatly esteemed, having had charge of this school a few years previous to enlisting. Much sympathy goes from here to the bereaved relatives.

YES! LIFT A CORN OFF WITHOUT PAIN!

Cincinnati authority tells how to dry up a corn or callus so it lifts off with fingers.

You corn-pestered men and women need suffer no longer. Wear the shoes that nearly killed you before, says this Cincinnati authority, because a few drops of freezone applied directly on a tender, aching corn or callus, stops soreness at once and soon the corn or hardened callus loosens so it can be lifted out, root and all, without pain.

A small bottle of freezone cost very little at any drug store, but will positively take off every hard or soft corn or callus. This should be tried, as it is inexpensive and is said not to irritate the surrounding skin.

If your druggist hasn't any freezone tell him to get a small bottle for you from his wholesale drug house. It is fine stuff and acts like a charm every time.

HOW JIMMIE WON HIS PRIVILEGE

Jimmie's father was the most trusted engineer in the employ of the great railroad that wound its way over the mountain range from the city in the valley on the east to the ocean at the west. For twenty years he had been in charge of the one train that left every other day to make the trip. To the west he would go one day and back to the east the next.

Ever since Jimmie had been able to toddle his father had taken him to visit the big locomotives that he drove. Jimmie's home was only a few feet from the track near one of the terminal stations and whenever his father could arrange to do so he would take his little son down to the station and board his engine with him. And whenever Jimmie could not be taken to visit the big piece of machinery he would watch for his father to pass and wave his little hand in response to the wave from the engine cab.

So it went on until Jimmie grew up to be five, six, seven and then eight years of age. Many kinds of toys his father bought for him in his babyhood. These amused him only a short while. He was all locomotive. He liked nothing so well as to be taken down to the track and then be lifted into the little cab.

By the time he was 6 years of age Jimmie had taken many trips with his father and had asked hundreds and hundreds of questions about all the parts and movements of the big machine. He never forgot anything that was told him. At least it seemed that way, because he could explain all about it afterward when his father questioned him, and it got to be a saying among those who listened to Jimmie talk about the locomotive that while he might not understand all he was telling he certainly told it as if he did.

When he grew to be 7 years of age Jimmie's father took him for his first trip from the starting to the finishing point. That was the joy moment of his life, you may be sure. His father fixed him a little seat near him in the cab, and as the locomotive puffed up the mountain side and he watched his father peering out ahead, with vigilant hand on the lever, he thought there never could be much greater happiness for any boy in the world.

As it got dark Jimmie's father—always with one hand on the lever—ate his supper with his little boy. It wasn't the most expensive kind of a supper, but it was very appetizing to Jimmie and his father, even though it did come out of a tin pail. And even while he ate Jimmie continued to ask questions about the trip and the machinery.

Shortly after supper the train reached the top of the mountain range and started down the other side.

"You had better go to sleep now, Jimmie," said his father. "I'll fix you up a little bunk right back to me. It is getting late, and I will need to give all my attention to the track as we go down this side of the mountain.

"But I'm not at all sleepy, papa," said Jimmie, "and besides I'd like to see how we go downhill."

"No, you had better sleep, Jimmie," said papa. And so saying he fixed the little bed for his boy.

But Jimmie couldn't sleep. He tried to obey his father, but it was of no use. He would keep one eye open watching the trees and telegraph poles on the mountain side flash by as the train acquired greater and greater speed. And he was still looking out of one eye when they reached the ocean terminal at 6 o'clock in the morning.

"Did you sleep pretty well, Jimmie?" asked his father as he helped his boy down from the bunk he had made.

"I didn't sleep at all, papa," answered Jimmie. "I didn't mean to disobey you, but I can't sleep when there is so much to see."

Jimmie's father scolded him some and then took him to the hotel and put him to bed until that night when it was time for the train to start back east. Jimmie promised to try to sleep, but it was no use—he had to keep awake because he was on a locomotive. So when Jimmie's father told the other engineers about it they called him from that day Engineer Jimmie.

The little boy could not rest content with that one trip. He coaxed his papa in season and out of season to make another and then another journey across the mountain. And by and by his father grew to plan on having his little boy with him in the cab, and so when Jimmie arrived at eight years of age he had been making the trips every week for two whole years.

The first trip that his father let him put his hand on the lever (right on top of his father's) was a proud time indeed for him. He peered out through the cab window just like his father did and imagined himself a grown man driving a great big mogul locomotive up and down the mountain side. By and by his papa would let him hold the lever when the locomotive was stopped and Jimmie proudly thought he had a large share in making the big machine stop puffing and moving. And when his father let him reach up his hand (along with his father's) and apply the air brake he thought he was the happiest boy alive.

"I know I could run a locomotive and put on the brakes right, papa," he told his father very earnestly in the engine yard shortly after this and all the engineers and firemen who stood near and heard him clapped their hands and laughed and cried:

"Indeed you can, Jimmie. We know you can."

Papa laughed too, but he said: "I really think you can, Jimmie, but I don't believe I'll have you do it just yet."

Right about this time there were two things that happened that you should know about in connection with this little story. One thing was there was a new division superintendent appointed on this section of the road. He was very strict and the men soon began to complain that he was too hard on them. The other thing was that Jimmie's father contracted a sickness that while it did not force him to stop work still grew on him, making him weaker and weaker.

He was advised to take a rest, but he refused to do so, saying that he would be better after a while. But he grew thin and Jimmie felt like crying many a time as he saw him drag himself wearily from their little house with his lunch pail in his hand to go down to the roundhouse and take his locomotive out. In the last two trips that Jimmie made the month before he had noticed his father bend over the lever in a strange way several times. Jimmie thought he was going to sleep and once he touched him so that he might wake him. His father just nodded and straightened up right away.

Jimmie had wanted to take a trip several times since the last one, but was told by his papa that he could not expect to go any more at all. The new division superintendent had seen him in his father's cab at the end of the last trip he had made and, stepping up to Jimmie's father, had said:

"Holmes, you know very well that there is a strict rule against outsiders riding in the engine cab. It makes no difference whether it is a child or not—those are the rules. I have heard that you have been in the habit of taking your boy with you frequently. You will have to stop it."

So that was why Jimmie had had no trips since. But his father did not like what the superintendent had said and the way in which he had said it. So when Jimmie coaxed hard one Saturday night to take another trip his father reluctantly consented.

"It is not exactly right, Jimmie," he said to the boy, "because rules are rules and on a railroad they mean a great deal more than they do in other places. But you are doing no harm with me and you are not taking my attention away from my work. So I'll let you take this one last trip. Do not come to the roundhouse, but get aboard the engine when we pull up to the station."

It was dark when the engine came out of the roundhouse and was coupled to the train at the station. Jimmie ran up to the cab and climbed in—he was a big eight-year-old now, you know, and could do it without being helped. The conductor waved his hand and the long train started.

Into the night they went puffing and pulling up the first steep grade. Jimmie stood back of his father gazing out into the darkness. Several feet to the rear on the other side of the boiler the fireman looked out of his window, once in a while jumping down to shovel coal in the furnace. Back of the locomotive the lights of the coaches streamed out into the gloom, lighting up the bare mountainside to which the train seemed to cling like a spider to its web.

Finally they reached the mountain top. Jimmie had already taken his share of his supper out of the pail, and his father had eaten sparingly. This done Jimmie lay down on his bunk and the train flew on down hill.

Many a time had Jimmie taken the trip and had always noted just about where the train began getting faster with the down grade. But this time it seemed to him that he had never seen it go so fast. They flew around one curve that he had always heard his father say was a dangerous part of the road.

Onward they went, the locomotive rocking and swerving back and forth in a strange way. Jimmie touched his father gently to inquire the reason for going so fast, or if they were going faster than usual. His father straightened up and even in the dim light that came from the gauge lamp he noticed a haggard look on his father's face he had never seen there before. But his father just nodded in a wabbling sort of a way and pulled the lever back a notch and put on the brakes for a moment. The train slowed some, but Jimmie saw that it was still going very fast.

Then his father put the lever where it had been before and in another second was nodding again. And also in another second the train was going faster than ever. Jimmie knew they were approaching Rock Bridge, a point on the descent where they entered a chasm over which there was a bridge across which the train had to pass with a sudden right angle curve in order to continue its way along the side of the mountain opposite.

Always his father had shut off steam and applied the brakes a full mile before this point was reached. Jimmie had been very much impressed with this from the time he had taken his first ride. They were nearing this mile shut off point, because he knew his father always marked the place by a big tree that stuck out from the mountain right alongside a telegraph pole. The tree had been struck by lightning and was a sure mark of location.

The mile shut off point was reached. Jimmie's father did not pull the lever and did not apply the brakes. The train roared on. Jimmie grew alarmed. He touched his father's arm again. There was no response. He shook the hand that held the lever. Still no answering motion. Jimmie put his arm about his father, climbed up on the bunk ledge in the cab and cried in his father's ear:

"Papa, what is the matter? Wake up, papa! Wake up!"

But not a sign did Jimmie's father make, because, as the doctors said afterward, he had sustained a paralytic stroke and could neither speak nor move.

Jimmie was only 8 years of age, but he knew what to do. He reached his little hand above that of his father's and unnotching the lever pulled it away back, although it was a hard tug for his boy strength. Then—although he had to stand on his father's lap to do it—he reached the airbrake handle and at first gently and then hard applied the brakeshoes to the many wheels under the train.

It was a hard task, I can tell you, to stop that train before it got to Rock Bridge and not shake the cars off the curving rails or the passengers out of their seats. The long down grade start was hard to control. But Jimmie worked the brakes like a veteran and when the bridge was reached the locomotive was moving as slowly as though Jimmie's father had been awake and doing it himself. Over the bridge they went slowly and when they got on the other side and turned to go down the mountain Jimmie put on the brakes to make a dead stop—and then—and then—what do you think? He went over to his papa and began to cry.

So the fireman climbed into the cab and soon the conductor and the brakemen came running up to know why they was a stop. And then, when they found Jimmie's father bent stiff over the lever and Jimmie crying and the fireman talking they began to feel grateful they were alive.

"I wondered above the mile shut off why we were going so fast," said the fireman, "and I was going to come into the cab and see if there was something the matter. But we slowed up some and I thought all was right again. Then we began to fly again. I thought Holmes wanted to make up some time. But when we neared the bridge I knew there must be something wrong. As I climbed in the cab I saw that we were slowing down all right. But I stayed a second longer to make sure, and there I saw that this little chap—little Jimmie—actually pulled the lever back and was putting on the air. I tell you he did it like a veteran. If he hadn't done it when he did we would all have been in the ravine now."

You should have heard what they said to Jimmie and have seen the purse they raised for him right there. They carried his father into the coach and Jimmie watched by his side the rest of the night.

"Who is taking us through since the engineer cannot do so?" asked a passenger of the conductor as he patted Jimmie on the head after he had heard all the story.

"Why, the fireman's but I wouldn't be afraid to trust Jimmie at the lever all the way in."

"Neither would I," said the passenger, "and I shall see to it that my friend, President Parker, of this road, hears about his heroism."

And you should have seen that very strict division superintendent take Jimmie in his arms and hug him when he got back. And you should have been at Jimmie's side the following week, which was Christmas. Papa was sitting up in bed when the package came. In it was a complete electric railroad system with —well, it looked like miles and miles of track. And with it also was a piece of blue pasteboard and a letter. The letter told Jimmie that during his vacation time in the summer he was to be engineer on the miniature railroad that was to run about the State fair grounds. But the blue pasteboard pleased him most of all. It read:

"Permit James Holmes to enter the cab of all locomotives on the mountain division for two hour trips after school hours and before dark. P. J. Parker, President."

Most Important of All.

Do you know of anything in this world more important than the preservation of health and life? If you do, you are wiser than all wisdom—or else a madman or a boob. A man ought to wash his hands before handling food for himself or anybody else, and not stick fingers, pins, money, or pencils or fingernails in the mouth. Never cough, sneeze, breathe near another person's face.—New York Press.

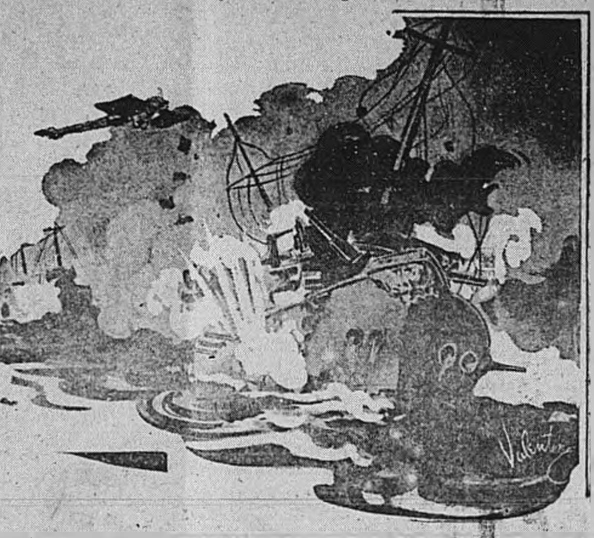
Manless Navies Will Battle By Wireless

Says an Expert



FUTURE WARS MAY BE FOUGHT BY PROPERTY, NOT MEN—NO BLOODSHED, NO HEROES, NO PATRIOTISM, NO ELECTRIC ENGINEERING.

Artist Valentine's conception of a naval battle without a man on board—the ships steered and guns fired by wireless, directed by a distant admiral from information supplied by the aeroplane scout.

Chicago—Before this century is more than half spent fleets of warships, without a man on board, may meet in battle at sea, piloted by wireless operators on the shores or on auxiliary vessels 30 miles away, and their guns aimed at and discharged by sparks that fly through the air from the operator's key.

That is the prediction of a soldierless, bloodless, heroless war made by H. E. Blanchard, associate editor of the Popular Electricity Magazine.

But it will be mighty tough on property!

Then a naval battle will be nothing more or less than a test of brains, steel and powder. Giant dreadnoughts will batter each other into junk piles, and clutter up the bottom of the ocean, but not a single drop of human blood will be shed. ... ...

"It isn't a fairy dream," says Blanchard, "for wireless invention is but an infant now. Genius will develop the use of it until such a thing as sending a whole fleet of battleships out unmanned to engage in battle with another fleet, also crewless, will be a matter-of-fact happening during war, the same as sending a fleet manned by human beings is to-day."

Christopher Wirth, a German wireless inventor, has already demonstrated in a test on a lake near Berlin, the fact that a vessel may be managed and its guns discharged by wireless from the shore. The German Navy department has taken up the idea and is trying to develop it.

"In the event of a wireless naval engagement the directing officer will have to be within seeing distance of the two fleets. That does not mean that he must see all the vessels with his own eyes. Aerial scouts will report by wireless to him the progress of the enemy's ships, and by the chart on the table before him he can maneuvre his own battleships and cruisers. He can pass the orders down to the assistant commanding the gunnery of a particular vessel who will instruct the wireless operator to flash the spark through the ether that will discharge any particular gun or guns.

"On the commander's ship will be none of the present-day equipment of war. He will have only his charts and his wireless outfit, all of which include differently tuned equipment for each of his vessels and for his aerial scouts.

"On board each warship will be the guns, the powerful storage batteries, for there will be no engineers or firemen aboard, and the wireless outfit that will keep the ship's course and its cannon in close obedience to the commanders' orders. If the battle is waged within 50 or 60 miles of the shore the commander will be stationed there.

Wirth's invention works like this: The vessel is equipped with the overhanging wires, tuned to the wires overhanging the sending keyboard. The receiving key is above a magnetized wheel, which, turning beneath the wireless sparks, forms circuits at certain points of contact. These various connections steer the vessel and fire the guns.

One great difficulty would be in aiming the guns. Blanchard thinks that an electro-magnetized mechanism on the gun will indicate the exact position of the nearest vessel facing it and will fire the gun automatically.

"Of course I realize," added Blanchard, "that a manless naval battle would be little more than an expensive game in which the best armament and electric skill would win. And I believe that it would make war mighty unpopular."

SUNDAY AT HOME

MI AIN COUNTRIE.

I'm far frae my hame, an' I'm weary aftenwhiles
For the langed-for hame-bringing, an' my Father's welcome smiles;
I'll ne'er be fu' content until my een do see
The gowden gates o' heaven, an' my ain countrie.
The earth is flecked wi' flowers—mony-tinted, fresh an' gay—
The birdies warble blithely, for my Father made them sae;
But these sichts an' these soun's will as naething be to me
When I hear the angels singing in my ain countrie.

I've His gude word o' promise, that, some gladsome day, the King,
To His ain royal palace His banished hame will bring;
Wi' een an' wi' hearts running o'wer we shall see
"The King in His beauty," an' our ain countrie.
My sins hae been mony, an' my sorrows hae been sair,
But there they'll never vex me, nor be remembered mair;
His bluid hath made me white, His hand shall dry mine e'e,
When He brings me hame at last to my ain countrie.

Like a bairn to its mither, a wee birdie to its nest,
I would fain be ganging noo unto my Saviour's breast;
For He gathers in His bosom witless, worthless lambs like me,
An' carries them Himsel' to His ain countrie.
He's faithfu' that hath promised—He'll surely come again—
He'll keep His tryst wi' me, at what hour I dinna ken;
But He bids me still to wait, an' ready aye to be
To gang at ony moment to my ain countrie.

THE NIGHT COMETH.

We hear it often said that life is but a day. It is said to express the shortness of our stay upon the earth. It is said, for the most part, sorrowfully. Let us reverse it, and say, with more striking truth, that each day is a life. Every day is a life, fresh with reinstated power, setting out on its allotted labor and limited path. Its morning resembles a whole youth. Its eventide is sobering into age. It is rounded at either end by a sleep—unconscious at the outset and oblivion at the close. We are born anew every time that the sun rises, and lights up the world for man to do his part in it. One thing at least may be shown of each day, as it dawns and darkens. It is that every one, short as it may be, embodies the fulness of the past, and indicates what is long afterwards to come. —N. L. Frothingham: A Day's Duty.

PRAYER BY MARY QUEEN OF HUNGARY.

O God! though sorrow be my fate,
And the world's hate
For my heart's faith pursue me,
My peace they cannot take away;
From day to day
Thou dost imbue me;
Thou art not far; a little while
Thou hidst Thy face, with brighter smile
Thy Father-love to show me.

Lord, not my will, but Thine, be done;
If I sink down
When men to terrors leave me,
Thy Father-love still warms my breast;
All's for the best;
Shall man have power to grieve me
When bliss eternal is my goal,
And Thou the keeper of my soul,
Who never will deceive me?

Thou art my shield, as saith the Word,
Christ Jesus, Lord,
Thou standest pitying me,
And lookest on each grief of mine
As if 't were Thine;
What then though foes may try me,
Though thorns be in my path concealed?
World, do thy worst! God is my shield,
And will be ever nigh me!

MIRACLES.

What is a miracle? It is a suspension of a lower law to make room for a higher; it is to stop a proud Pharisee on the road and turn him into an empty and humble man. Is the age of miracles past? No. We stand for miracles, the whole church stands for miracles, the miracle of the spiritual and the supernatural. The Holy Ghost is the soul of the miraculous. There is no miracle like the miracle of grace, which changes the bloodthirsty bigot into a man of peace with the heart of a child.

Here is a zone occupied entirely by God, who can tell, with all his searching and inquiring, where the line is that divides the supernatural, that separates the human from the divine, whether in being, in history, or in record? The Bible has human authors and a divine message. Surely John the Baptist was an imperfect man, but a perfect witness; by the miracle of spiritual discernment man can receive a perfect message by an imperfect messenger. The Bible has human authors, but they are comparatively so unimportant that no one can tell who they are in many cases.

The miracles of the Bible and of all history are not enough. "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead; I am the bread of life!" Milton wrote "Paradise Lost," we can say truly that Milton is in the book, but we cannot say that he is with the book, for his record is ended. God is in the Bible, but He is also with the Bible. Here is the secret! and no longer a secret. The secret of the "lodge" man is well guarded. Sentinels are at the door when they meet, but our secret is open. We proclaim it, we urge it, we command it, and our miracle worker is ever at hand to interpret, to explain, to impart, to inspire wonder, awe and amazement.

The spirit of man speaks of man, but the spirit of God understands both God and man, and gives discernment and leads them out of the deep bondage than that of Egypt, and leads him to the promised land, where he waits and serves, and searches and wonders, at the miracle of grace that has made him acceptable in the beloved. The Bible remains secure in title and character, but to be the book of life. The wonder-working miracle must be felt as plentiful as dewdrops, as beautiful as the songs of birds, as freshening as the water of life, or there is no life.

Wonder, awe, amazement are the children of one mother, the name of that mother is reverence. Christ has done honor to the human body by calling it to be the temple of the Holy Ghost. In this temple there must be reverence; there must be reverence for self, before there can be reverence for God. "God is in this place and I knew it not; how dreadful is this place! Take off thy shoes, for the place where thou standest is holy ground." Here and here only, can you awake and hear the voice that Samuel heard in his childhood.

"Would you like to know the sweetness of the secret of the Lord?
Go and hide beneath His shadow; this shall be your reward.
And whene'er you leave the silence of that happy meeting place,
You will bear the shining image of the Master in your face."

—H. T. Miller.

AS MOUNTAINS ROUND JERUSALEM.

If we feel assured of the grace of God through the mediation of Christ, we have just reason to hope that futurity will unfold to us with joy and gladness; and, as there is a just and gracious God, who orders and directs the universe, who knows all the events of our lives, and before whose views is continually present the circle of eternity, we may with safety, when we lie down to sleep, commend ourselves to His care, undisturbed as to what may happen during the day. And in the hour of trial, when dangers threaten and destruction seems to impend, let us still remember the goodness of God, and rely upon His protecting arm, in perfect assurance that whatever happens is for our good.—From the German of Christopher Christian Sturm.

GIFTS.

When the blessed Master ascended in triumph He received gifts for men—can we go through the factory where men are made, can we visualize the process, can we make the siftings, the sortings, watch the precipitants as they fall into this skull or that?

What a close corporation is this factory: What a monopolist is God! Does He let us into the secret, are we invited to the inner chamber where destinies, affinities, are carefully distributed? No doubt the angels wonder, no doubt man is oppressed by the study. It is left to man to study, reflect and arrange, to classify men and make a guess. God begins low and works up; Luther came from a miner's hut, Jesus from the carpenter's shop, John Newton from the deck of a slaver, and George Whitfield from a tavern. "He distributeth gifts severally as He will."

Who taught Joan of Arc warfare, where did Galileo and Keppler and Tycho Brahe learn the music of the spheres? Who taught Homer to compose and sing heroic poems, two hundred years before the Greeks had an alphabet? Who taught Abraham Lincoln politics, or Cromwell tactics? and whence Napoleon's inspiration when he declared, "Impossible is the adjective of fools." Buddha, Confucius, Socrates had their gifts and callings. Thomas Carlile takes up his pen and writes very fully on Mahomet, and misses the great drift and power of the man's life. His great mission was to destroy idolatry, make God supreme, and man one! Children are not allowed dolls or animal playthings, for fear of idolatry; the Sultan's image is never seen in picture or on coins of currency. When the Sultan goes to the masque to worship he wears a plain red fez, the meanest slave boy in the camel cavalcade wears the same headgear, to show that man is one! Does God employ wicked men? Yes! "He has the wicked for the day of evil." It is calculated that Bonaparte slaughtered two million and a quarter of men. He went down under the united curse of mothers, and yet he had a mission. One was to topple over the rotten thrones where every abomination was found, and designing men worked their will.

Stormy winds fulfill His word and purpose, and earthquake and hurricane, and iceberg are ministers of His high behest. Who will not fear and have Him in reverence?

The gifts and garments of humility await us, come into the wardrobe and be adorned; without humility no man shall see the Lord.

H. T. Miller.

THE IDEAL HOSTS.

"English country houses are, to my taste, the most elegant and at the same time the most comfortable places imaginable. In my India sketches I have already paid tribute to the wonderful hospitality of the Briton, and I should like to mention it gratefully again. At home we are apt to think a guest must be everlastingly amused; he is worn to death with the occupations, pleasures, 'sight-seeing,' provided by his host. There is nothing of this kind in England. Unless there is something special on foot, such as a shoot, each guest is absolutely his own master. The whole home and home of the hosts is in the fullest sense of the word at the guest's absolute disposal. He has only to say the word, and he can ride, motor, fish, shoot, sail, play tennis, or flirt—everything is at his hand. The English excel in this art of genial and thoughtful entertaining."—From My Hunting Day-Book, by the Crown Prince of Germany.

"The postmaster at Plainville says that if he doesn't handle more mail they'll close the office." "Tell him to put an 'ad.' in the local paper stating rich widow wants husband."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Hoax—Have you ever looked up your family tree? Joax—No; I'm afraid I might have a few cocoanuts thrown at me. Hoax—Elucidate. Joax—Well, you know, I'm a firm believer in the Darwinian theory of evolution.

Mr. and Mrs. T. Bryce visited their friends here on Sunday.

Mr and Mrs. A. M. King spent Saturday with their daughter Mrs. E. Grant.

Mrs. Wm McKelvey is visiting her daughter in Paisley.

We are pleased to hear that Mr. John Purves has resigned. He had been nominated some time ago by Conservatives as their standard bearer, but feeling as a great many of the people of both parties that we should bury party differences at present, and combine all our efforts toward winning the war and back up the boys who are fighting our battles. The South is setting the North a good example and we would like very much to see both parties come together and choose a man that would be acceptable to all. We do not want an election at this particular time when we all should be united. How would it be to let things stand as they are in Bruce and give it to Clark in the North and Truax in the South. We understand that these gentlemen are strong Union government supporters. Mr. Purvis and Mr. McCauley are practically young men yet and can afford to wait

Mr. Case, president of the Elderslie Sunday School Association, Mr. Oswald of Elderslie, Mr. and Mrs C. J. Halliday, of Chesley, made their official visit to Ebenezer Sunday. Mr. Case and Mr. Halliday gave inspiring addresses on the importance of keeping up the attendance and organization of classes.

Mr. J. De Pool, president of Arran S. S. Association and Richard Grant visited Seng's Sunday School on Sunday last.

Liquor ordered by Jos. Foster, of Bruce Tp., from Detroit was seized at Paisley station by Inspector White. At night some one stole the whiskey. Now Mr. Foster who had sent his money to Detroit for the booze, is suing the Express Co. for non-delivery of goods.

The Executive of the South Bruce Liberal Association, which met in Walkerton on Tuesday afternoon to consider an invitation from the South Bruce Conservative Executive to call a joint convention and bring out a Union candidate, has rejected the offer.

As Ye Shall be Judged

For there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law: and as many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law; for not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified.—Romans 1 1. 11-13.

Nocturne

The following poem appeared in The Globe last week and is by Reginald Mann of Port Elgin, who has had frequent contributions in the larger publications:

A cleft in the clouds,
And over this, frail silver drapery.
Beyond is the moon, and riding deep
In a mystery of space and light.
Peeping with wonder
At the earth, stretched in gloomy
Stolidness, infinities below.,
Colories and vague in the night.
And to our ears
A sympathy is borne from the ultra distant
Orchestra of stars, swelling forth
Thro' the vast cathedral of the universe:
Harmonious millions!
That rise toward the great crescendo,
Guided by th' Eternal Artist's hand,
Playing on until the course of time be run.
A smiling moon
Among the clouds that cover the earth
While the night rings, is riding deep
In a mystery of space and light.

The clouds shall pass away;
And the moon shall wax no more;
Even the night shall fade forever.
On the long and [illegible] journey
Up the Ray the traveller,
Passing, sings a fragment
In the night.

PYROTECHNICS

If you should happen to meet in the purlieus of your metropolitan hamlet, a painful pessimist who would have you believe that the spirits of our lads at the front are at a low ebb, that their one desire in life is to end the war at any cost, then you have my full permission and authority to brand him a super-Ananias; and, lest he protest too vigorously that his opinion is just as good as yours, then you may produce in evidence against him this little story of a night in front of the front line.

Working parties were out, the men putting every bit as much heart into their digging as they do into everything pertaining to the strafing of the Boche. The men in the front line were widening and deepening trenches. Covering parties and patrols peopled the mysterious darkness that hung over No Man's Land. Sentries were standing very watchful at their posts. In fact, it was just a typical night on the western front.

There was no actual warning of the thing at all. A few spasmodic bursts of rifle grenades that registered perilously near the diggers indicated that Fritz had some vague suspicion that we were not idle; but that all comes in the night's work, and worried nobody. A few hours in the front line breed a fine contempt for anything of less calibre than a rum jar. Then, about the hour before the working parties were due to return, the real thing happened. Three four-point-two's that smashed into the front line opened the ball; and then it seemed as though the stars had commenced a game of general post. The sky was full of sweeping fiery tails, lunging in mighty parabola towards us. Rum jars!

Now the rum jar, or giant trench mortar, is probably the most potent weapon of the Boche. It is no respecter of persons and makes game of the widest of traverses. It is a thing distinctly to be avoided. It has its compensations, like all evils, and the greatest of these is that you can see it coming, and dodge it. But dodging is a difficult matter when a hundred rum jars are in the air at the same time. That is how it was on this night. The air was full of them! They came to earth with nerve shuttering crashes. They made pandemonium of the calm of peaceful war.

But presently a strange thing happened. Instead of the devastating crash, there came scarcely any noise at all—a simple "pop," scarce more than the explosion of a puffed up paper bag banged between the hands of a child. "Duds" make a noise like that, but it was not conceivable that there should be so many "duds" all at once. There was only one other explanation, and, of course, it turned out to be the true one. Gas! We got our respirators ready, but as the wind was the other way, and the bursts were at least a hundred and fifty yards from us, we carried on with the work.

The "strafe" lasted an hour all told. It was very heavy, and, I have no doubt, the Boche thought that it was highly demoralizing. As to that, this is what I want you to tell the painful pessimist.

A Cockney corporal who was working near where I stood turned round to a pal and said:

"Lemme, Bill, look at these bloomin' fireworks. Beats the Crystal Palace, this does, and you've got to pay there!"

A subaltern stood on a heap of newly turned soil and muttered soulfully:

"Pretty—oh, pretty! Best sight I've seen since I've been out! And they think they've got us running, I bet. What a sell!"

We still went on working. Not for a single moment did the men lay down their tools. They paused for perhaps a moment at the beginning to see where the rum jars dropped. A quarter of an hour after the strafe ended they filed out, at the appointed time, and went home to sleep.

Tell that to your painful pessimist.

The publisher of the best Farmer's paper in the Maritime Provinces in writing to us states:

"I would say that I do not know of a medicine that has stood the test of time like MINARD'S LINIMENT. It has been an unfailing remedy in our household ever since I can remember, and has outlived dozens of would-be competitors and imitators."

THE AIRPLANE'S LIMIT.

Fliers as Big as Ocean Liners Are an Impossibility.

I am not one of those who entertain extravagant ideas concerning the future of the airplane. All sorts of ridiculous notions are afloat, largely fathered by people of lively imagination and of limited information. I do not believe that all transportation in future will be through the air. The airplane will not supplant the railroad, the trolley car or the motor car. It will merely be another agency for performing a similar kind of work.

There are certain things that it will do better than the railroad or the motor car, and its use will therefore be limited to these, for we must realize at the start that the airplane has decided limitations. We see enormous pictures to-day of aircraft as large as ocean liners, but there are merely vain imaginings. We shall have no airplanes as large as the Lusitania.

Anyone who understands the fundamentals of air mechanics will immediately understand why this is so. The airplane is built essentially upon the same principles as a bird. It has the same flying capabilities as a bird and precisely the same limitations. The best flier among birds is the humming bird, and certain insects, which are much smaller, such as the dragon fly are also wonderful fliers. It is a law of nature that the larger the bird the poorer its flying ability.

There are excellent mechanical reasons for this. The main one is that as a bird increases in size its weight increases at a much greater rate than the area of its wings. Thus if a bird doubles its size it would need, to lift itself in the air, not twice as much power, but eight times as much—that is, its weight increases as its cube, whereas the area of the wings increases as its square. This is the principle that limits the size of birds, and it is also the principle that limits the size of airplanes, which fly just as birds fly. Each increase in size demands a much greater proportional increase in motive power, the result being that we have to add so enormously to the weight that the airplane soon reaches a size where it cannot leave the ground. From interview with Orville Wright by Burton J. Hendrick in Harper's Magazine.

SANTA CLAUS WRITES.

North Pole, Nov. 1, 1917.

Dear Children: I have received many letters from you already, and most of them ask me, rather wistfully, whether I am coming around this year (on account of the war, you know). So I thought I would answer a lot of your letters at once by writing to the paper in this way.

I have been very busy for a long time now, making things for the soldiers and sailors [illegible] sending them away, across the [illegible] to the training camps [illegible]. I have also been [illegible] and sending things to the little [illegible] children in Belgium and France and all those other places where the terrible war is being fought.

Not many of [illegible] have been toys and such. Most of them have been useful things to wear, to eat, or to really use in other ways. It is a long time since I made so many useful things instead of so many toys, and I can tell you that it was pretty hard for me to remember how to do it.

I know it was right for me to do it, even if it has made [illegible] of the things that I usually have for you. I think—and I hope I am right—that you are glad to have me do it and that if I had written to ask you about it you would have told me to go ahead.

So many of the soldiers and sailors were children like yourselves only a little while ago. Perhaps they don't look forward to Christmas with the same eagerness that you do, but I like to think that the things I have made and sent them make them happier and more comfortable while they are fighting for us.

And now to answer your questions about coming around this year. Of course, you all know what Christmas day is—that it was Christ's birthday, and that is why we make it a holiday. That is one reason why I have always looked upon Christmas as the children's special day. So, in spite of the war and of all the time I have spent sending things to the soldiers and sailors, I expect to come around this year as usual. No, not quite as usual, because I expect the things I can bring you will bear the marks of what I have been doing for the others. I shall not bring so many toys—or such expensive ones—but what I do bring for you will, I hope, be more useful and just as pleasing. Certainly it will carry just as much love and good wishes as ever.

I don't see why I should forget you or pass you by entirely because of the war work I have been doing and expect still to do. After all, it is your day, and I am still

Killed Soul of Germany

In the olden days somebody once asked, "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" and Prussia, in these later days, has answered—soldier, philosopher and economist alike—that it would profit immeasurably; that the loss of the soul was but a small price to pay for the winning of the whole world and the setting up of a state which, in power, wealth and prestige, should overtop even the Roman Empire itself in the most august days of the Caesars.

Just when it was that Prussia reached the conviction that the soul was a stumbling block in the way of material and military success, it would be hard to say. Those of us who have read the "Confessions of Frederick the Great" will feel that as early as the middle of the eighteenth century the father of modern Prussianism had "lost his own soul," having cast it out as being antagonistic to the principles of the infamous Machiavelli, of whom he was an avowed and delighted pupil.

Perhaps it will be as well, before we go any further, to define our terms. The soul of which we speak is the soul as recognized by the greatest moral teacher of all time, whom we have quoted above. And when He asked His question, nineteen hundred years ago, the world knew perfectly well what He meant by the soul; for the term had conveyed a clear idea to men's minds from the very dawn of civilization. It means the same thing throughout the civilized world to-day, except in those portions of it upon which has fallen the dark eclipse of so-called Prussian Kultur.

The Prussian, of course, would indignantly deny that he had lost his soul. Judging from the Kaiser's boisterous announcement of his copartnership with the Almighty, he believes, doubtless, that in discarding the soul of Christianity he has found the supersoul of Kultur, the soul of the superman. Be that as it may, it is certain that the deceit, dishonor and trickery which, as our State Department has shown, marked everywhere the course of Prussian diplomacy before the war, and the murder, rapine, piracy and unprintable abominations which the Prussian army has perpetrated during the war, prove that Prussia, from Emperor down to enlisted man, has cast out of herself that very soul which has banded together practically all the civilization of the earth to break down and blot out, once and for all, a military philosophy which reduced to the language of everyday life, stands for mere burglary and brigandage.

In material things, at least, the Prussian is nothing if he is not logical; and when he set out to conquer the world by military methods he determined to apply to the problem the acid test of material efficiency. He passed in review the whole range of mundane life, all that goes to make up the sum total of human activity. Everything that would conduce to the winning of world domination he retained. Everything that would not be cast out. During this process of selection he came to consider the soul, with its attributes of honor, mercy, humanity, fidelity, chivalry, charity and moral rectitude. And he found that, so far from contributing to the highest military success, the soul of Christianity and civilization, with its obligations to magnanimity, generosity and good faith, was utterly incompatible with that cold, remorseless, material and military efficiency by the development and exercise of which he hoped at once to Prussianize and possess the world.

And so, with deliberation and with clear eyed knowledge of what he was doing, he put aside the soul as likely to prove not only unserviceable but utterly destructive both of his unholy philosophy and the barbaric dream which it cloaked but did not entirely conceal.

Now in our modern civilization, when a man deliberately casts out his soul, we class that man as a criminal. It matters not what particular form of outlawry he adopts; whether he become safe cracker, house burglar, horse thief or counterfeiter—he is a criminal by choice and by profession. Nor does the possession of extraordinary mentality, of rare versatility, of many accomplishments in the arts and sciences, or of the social graces, serve to do anything more than make heavier his accountability and increase the detestation of his crime.

By the degree to which Germany has been fruitful in art, science, industry and social uplift, by so much the more was the murder of her own soul a foul deed, first against herself and then, as the present frightful catastrophe has shown, against all humanity.

Therefore, when we read of a Bernstorff using the privileges of his high and honorable office as a channel for treacherous intrigue—of a Hollweg announcing, without a tremor of shame, that Prussia had torn up a treaty and invaded a small and friendly state because it suited her convenience to do so—of a Von Kluck standing silent and acquiescent while his soldiery fell upon the helpless peasants with rape, robbery and the torch—of a Tirpitz besmirching the chivalric traditions of the sea by the deliberate drowning of unarmed and unoffending men, women and children—of the deliberate violation of that sacred symbol the Red Cross—of a Kaiser standing in the midst of his organized devilry and calling upon God to witness that he ever was, is now, and ever will be, the apostle of peace and good will—when we read of such doings, let us cease to cry, "How can these things be?" and remember that when a nation has lost its own soul these are the very things that will inevitably happen.—Scientific American.

BRIDGE COLLAPSE RECALLS ROMANCE OF NORTHWEST

Telegraph Wire Left by Overland Pioneers Was Used by Indians to Build This Remarkable Structure.

The suspension bridge constructed by the Hagwilget Indians across the Bulkley River in Central British Columbia has collapsed and now floats in the waters of Hagwilget Canyon, held by the cables on which it was suspended for more than twenty years. The news will be received with regret by engineers in all parts of the world. This frail structure was regarded as a remarkable example of Indian skill in bridge building and had been a subject of comment in many engineering magazines, while it was also regarded as one of the many features of interest seen from the trains of the Grand Trunk Pacific line. Conceived in the mind of a native and built by his fellow tribesmen, the true principles of the modern suspension bridge were carried into the construction work. The bridge was the third attempt to get a permanent crossing over the Bulkley River, the first two bridges having been swept away by high water. When the Indians built this bridge they had no modern tools, nor did they have nails, spikes or bolts, wooden spikes and telegraph wire being used at joints. The bridge had a span of 146 feet and was 10 feet wide.

Interwoven with the story of the Indian bridge is a romance of the Northwest. The telegraph wire used in its construction was discovered by the Indians at a point some eight hundred miles west of Edmonton and 40 miles inland from the Pacific Coast, where it had been hidden for many years. This is how it happened. Between the date of the unsuccessful and the day of the successful attempts to lay a submarine cable which would connect New York and London, a plan was put forth for an overland telegraph line from New York to St. Petersburg. The close of the Civil War found the country full of men of mettle. Some of the old campaigners were selected and sent to work.

In the meantime, while these heroic explorers were working away in the wilderness, London and New York were coupled up by the submarine cable. Instantly, all interest in the overland disappeared, as the need of the line no longer existed. Away out on the Northern corner of this continent there is a line of fifty-year-old telegraph poles. It is easy to understand and appreciate the disappointment of these brave fellows who had fought the good fight in sun and rain for over a year and a half, only to be told to quit. And that is how they happened to leave the telegraph wire used in the bridge in a cache on the river, along whose banks the Grand Trunk Pacific transcontinental trains are now travelling.

When this enthusiastic band of workers went home, the "silent places" fell asleep again, and the younger generation forgot. After forty years more of unbroken sleep, other telegraph builders blazed the trail planting poles and stringing wires. What was regarded as a worthless wilderness was hailed as the new Empire of the North, teeming with natural riches. This time they succeeded, for the men were on the payroll of the Grand Trunk Pacific Telegraph Company, and the wires follow the right-of-way of Canada's new line. This modern successor of the overland has become an important factor in handling the telegraph business of a large section of the continent.

THE THINKER.

Back of the beating hammer
  By which the steel is wrought,
Back of the workshop's clamor,
  The seeker may find the Thought,
The Thought that is ever master
  Of iron and steam and steel,
That rises above disaster
  And crushes it under heel.

The drudge may fret and tinker
  Or labor with lusty blows,
But back of him stands the Thinker,
  The clear-eyed man who knows;
For into each plow or sabre,
  Each piece and part and whole,
Must go the brains of labor
  Which gives the work a soul!

Back of the motors humming,
  Back of the belts that sing,
Back of the hammers drumming,
  Back of the cranes that swing,
There is the eye which scans them
  Watching through stress and strain,
There is the Mind which plans them,
  Back of the brawn—the Brain!

Might of the roaring boiler,
  Force of the engine's thrust,
Strength of the sweating toiler,
  Greatly in these we trust,
But back of them stand the Schemer,
  The Thinker who drives things through
Back of the Job—the Dreamer
  Who's makes the Dream come true!

Quilted Japanese Vests With Satin Outside and Silk Inside.

Those quilted Japanese vests which so many women like to slip under their coats in cold weather now come with satin outside and habutai silk inside. Some have sleeves and some haven't.

The long, shawl-shaped collar is particularly fashionable, and among the new pieces is one style of Georgette crepe in this popular shape. Real lace trimming and a touch of hand embroidery make it quite lovely.

An extremely handsome new fur coat was of Persian broadtail, with big collar and cuffs of the now fashionable skunk.

A great many women now wear bloomers in preference to petticoats so says one shopkeeper who ought to know. If milady prefers the bloomers she may have them in crepe de chine in light colors or black satin if she wishes something more practical.

Counting the Salmon.

The Wood river in Alaska has been closed to fishing for many years and is resorted to for breeding purposes by red salmon escaping the nets in Nushagak bay. The counting of the salmon was first undertaken in 1908, and has been continued annually since that time, except in 1914.

The counting is made possible by throwing a rack across the stream and compelling the fish to pass through a narrow gate, where they are readily visible to persons immediately above. Agents of the fisheries bureau in relays are kept on duty day and night for the entire period of the run, and the tally is kept by an automatic counting device manipulated by hand.

The highest count for any one day in recent years was 25,331.—New York Sun.

CANADA'S HOLD NOW SECURE ON THE RIDGE

Long-Expected Counter by the Germans Came and Failed.

MANY ATTACKS

Every One Repulsed—Striking Forecast is Fulfilled.

Canadian Headquarters in France, cable: Hindenburg has failed. The boasted attack which was to have swept our troops off Passchendaele Ridge was launched late yesterday afternoon. From Vindictive cross roads to Vocation farm the enemy advanced in force, only to be met by the terrific fire of our artillery, causing him heavy losses every step of the advance. Those of the enemy who survived our barrage were caught by rifle and machine gun fire, and repulsed all along the line by our infantry.

As he has failed to blast our men out of the position, so the enemy has failed to drive them out. Canada is secure on the ridge. Our troops have been [illegible] strengthening the forward line, while our guns have been advanced to new positions.

Prepared for yesterday's attack, our artillery and infantry co-operated in a decisive defeat of picked fighting troops of the central empires.

OVER TWO DOZEN ATTACKS.

The story of Passchendaele is one of severe enemy casualties, steady loss of ground and declining morale. The Canadian corps has moved steadily to its objectives.

There have been captured during the several battles 1,174 prisoners, including two battalion commanders. Over two dozen attacks and counter-attacks have been broken up in the last three weeks by our men. Our line overlooks Keiberg spur, Roulers Plain, Moorslede and the green, rolling country of [illegible] and villages [illegible] untouched by the war.

Behind us are Mosselmarkt, Meetcheele, Bellevue, Crest farm, long months of enemy [illegible] that were enemy pillboxes, blasted trees, mud and devastation. Enemy shells are blasting Passchendaele, our guns are blasting [illegible], while our men are toiling to strengthen their positions in the mud. From Passchendaele to Ypres mist [illegible] over the land, veiling the desolation. Our men have won their way [illegible] the valley of the shadow [illegible] the salient, to the heights that [illegible] domination, the crown of [illegible] achievement.

THE DEAD OF THREE YEARS.

The dead of the Empire lie in the valley, the dead of three years, our dead of Langemarck, of St. Julien, of yesterday and of to-day. Because of them the living who fought with them followed after them, the ridge is ours. The tragedy of low graves is relieved [illegible] of high hill. For the triumph that is Passchendaele is shared by all. The shadow over the valley is lifting.

Up to the ridge and on to the ridge the Canadian corps stormed its way in a remarkable series of battles. When I arrived in France, October 20, the corps had just moved into the salient.

In a room at headquarters I was told: "Our objective is Passchendaele. We will take it in three jumps, the first will carry us to Bellevue Spur, the second will take us to the Crest Farm, Meetcheele, and the third will give us the village. Our first attack will be on October 15th, our second about November 1st, and the third five or six days later."

It was a striking prophecy, strikingly fulfilled. Canada knows now how the schedule was observed. It could not know before, for it is only possible to tell the story now of how the corps moved up its men, its guns, its munitions, equipment, and supplies, and smashed its way on time through the enemy defences, held by troops without peers in the Central empires.

TRIUMPH OF STAFF WORK

There has been praise for the infantry, praise for the artillery; there should be great praise for the staff. For the taking of Passchendaele has been a triumph of staff work in the great departments of G and Q and other vital branches behind the line, as well as of the combatant arms. The whole corps was moved as a man might move pieces on a checker board. [illegible] battalion went forward with all supplies essential to the objective, were relieved, and went forward again, victory following victory. Light and heavy guns were brought up over the roads that were [illegible] for their coming. They were [illegible] on temporary foundations, or [illegible] bottoms between yawning shell [illegible], then moved forward again with the advance.

Passchendaele has been a triumph of mind as much as of men and guns, a triumph of mind and of co-operation between the different services working together with precision towards a common end. Bellevue Spur and the first footing on the ridge of Crest Farm and Meetcheele, Passchendaele — three battles and three victories, as planned. The achievement has been great. The cost has been heavy. Many noble men of yours have died for Canada.

"If ye break faith with us who die, we shall not sleep, though poppies blow in Flanders fields."

Australia: Do you have any police protection out where you live? Suburbia—Oh, yes; no trouble about that. There's a saloon in the next corner, and we have an Irish cook right in our own kitchen.

Immunity Suspended at French Senator's Wish.

Paris cable: The Senate yesterday voted to suspend the immunity of Senator Chas. Humbert, owner of the Paris Journal. This is to allow Bolo Pasha, under arrest for espionage, to institute proceedings against Humbert.

Bolo Pasha has charged that he loaned money to Senator Humbert in order to complete the purchase of the Journal. He also has accused the Senator of keeping 43,650 francs. Senator Humbert last week asked the Senate to approve the suspension of immunity, after he has explained to an examining committee how he has employed the money Bolo accused him of keeping.

Under the plan of organization proposed, one of the duties of the vigilance corps in every city and town would be the classification of all residents under the following classes: Loyal, disloyal, doubtful, unknown. After the completion of this classification a further designation is [illegible] as follows:

CROP REPORT FOR ONTARIO

Young Fall Wheat and Rye Picking Up.

Roots Turning Out Well as a Class.

Toronto despatch: Following is a summary of weekly crop reports made by district representatives to the Ontario Department of Agriculture.

The young fall wheat and rye have picked up somewhat, owing to the recent warmer weather, although yet comparatively backward, owing to the late seeding and delayed growth during the cold weather in October. The [illegible] Representative reports seeing a farmer sowing fall wheat during the week.

Beans have suffered from the unfavorable weather of the past month, and are generally late in being harvested. Considerable of the crop was injured by frost.

Roots are turning out well as a class, and storing is nearly completed. Turnips are described as being very uniform in size, and mangels and sugar beets are also favorably regarded both as to yield and quality.

Some potatoes were [illegible], as representatives reported. Sometimes regarding yield, quality and price vary considerably.

New seeding of clover promises well; in fact clover fields generally will enter the winter in very fair condition where they have not been pastured too close.

Some Spy apples were still on the trees in Norfolk at the end of the week. Apples in that county are selling at from $1.75 to $2 a bushel, tree run. In boxes, properly graded, they bring $2.50 to $2.75, and in barrels they range from $5 to $6, according to variety and quality.

Stockers are selling well at auction sales, even though of only medium quality. Many cattle already have been put in for the winter, as pastures had not very poor, owing to the bad weather of October. For this reason also the milk flow has fallen off, more especially as mill feed and other concentrates are very high in price. The Leeds representative states that the factory at Athens is paying its members $50 a ton net for milk delivered at the factory in fit condition to ship to the Brockville Condensary. The Lanark representative says: "The total output of milk, according to a cheesemaker I talked with, will be about the same as that of last year; [illegible] much ahead but the latter part is behind."

Hogs are being marketed steadily, but some sold have been below weight and generally unfinished. Prices range from $15 to $16 per cwt.

As to fodders, hay and coarse grains are plentiful, but ensilage and shelled corn will be comparatively scarce, and much of it inferior in quality.

The agricultural labor situation is more or less in a daze, and will be until the more immediate matter of military conscription has been settled. Farmers are naturally waiting to see how this calling out of men is going to effect them before they finally make their plans for the coming season. Meantime all necessary field work, such as the storing of roots and other late crops is being pushed along, together with a fair amount of fall ploughing, which has been favored during the week by more open weather. Thrashing, for various reasons, has been greatly delayed this season. One representative states that more farms are going to be worked on shares.

HISTORIC MANSION DESTROYED.

London Cable.—Sir John Horner's mansion at Mells Park, which has been partly destroyed by fire, was the "plum" which gave rise originally to the familiar rhyme about "Little Jack Horner." The poem was written as a piece of political doggerel. At the time of the Dissolution, a certain John Horner was steward of the great Abbey of Glastonbury, and with the dissolution of the Monasteries he secured his "plum" the Manor of Mells. Since that time the eldest son of the Horner family has always been named John.

Some people never profit by their own mistakes so long as they can make something out of other people's.

HUNS CONSIDER AN ARMISTICE

Press Views On the Bolsheviki Offer.

Amsterdam cable: The German Independent Socialists, according to the Tageblatt, of Berlin, publish in the Volks Zeitung of Leipzig a manifesto calling upon the Socialist proletariat in Germany to respond to the Russian peace offer, as made by the Maximalist Government in Petrograd. The manifesto suggests that meetings be held everywhere in favor of a general armistice for the purpose of obtaining a peace without annexations.

BERLIN PRESS VIEWS.

A Berlin cable, via London—The Berlin press generally gives a friendly reception to the peace manifesto of the Russian Maximalists. The Vorwaerts, the Socialist organ, and the Germania, the Catholic organ, both raise the question as to whether the Bolsheviki will retain power in Russia.

The question as to whether the belligerents are ready for three months' armistice for the purpose of discussing peace, the Vorwaerts says, can only be answered by the German Government affirmatively, declaring at the same time that it does not intend to annex or consent to annexation at Germany's cost. Whatever Germany has to say concerning annexations, it adds, is contained in the Reichstag resolution of July 19 and in the German reply to the Pope. The Vorwaerts continues:

"German Socialists do not accept all the theories of the Bolsheviki, but recognize them as Socialists and comrades. Therefore, they gladly regard the Bolsheviki offer as worthy of Socialists and most promising."

A temporary cessation of hostilities between Russia and the Central powers, the Germania says, would bring peace nearer. It adds that Germany and Austria-Hungary would promptly agree to a limited armistice as proposed, and that Russia's allies could not escape the effects of such a step.

The difficulties of arranging such an armistice are pointed out by the National Zeitung, which asks how an armistice would be interpreted. While the Allied blockade of Germany would be raised, the Zeitung objects to such a procedure on the ground that England could then calmly re-stock herself, while Germany would not enjoy any benefits, adding:

"For who would supply Germany? The [illegible] countries yet neutral would count for little."

BULGARS SCOFF.

Amsterdam cable: Aroused apparently by the Maximalist peace offer, the Mir of Sofia, organ of the Bulgarian national party, says that the Bulgarians cannot permit themselves to be troubled by the [illegible] of Russia, illusionists or the Dutch-Scandinavian committee, it adds:

"Bulgarians are completely unanimous that Bulgaria's future imperatively demands the possession of Dobrudja to the mouth of the Danube River."

DESTROYER IS DREAD OF SUB.

Advances Made in Finding and Ending U-Boats.

Vessels' Immunity Depends On Their Speed.

Washington report says: [illegible] progress has been made [illegible] the problem of locating submarines, after which their destruction is comparatively simple matter, Secretary Daniels said to-day in a statement in which he discussed the 40,000 separate suggestions, plans, or models of devices submitted to the Naval Consulting Committee since the United States entered the war against Germany.

"The idea that the submarine will be overcome by a miraculous invention is not now seriously considered," the Secretary said.

"The more intimate knowledge civilian obtains on this subject the more convinced he is that the submarine can be conquered by persistently hunting him down by the weapon of which he is most afraid. This is the armed service boat, equipped with all the latest scientific devices and typified in the modern torpedo boat destroyer. Foreign naval authorities have frankly stated their admiration of the degree of perfection of American designs.

"In regard to the protection of ships against torpedo attacks the undeniable evidence of recent months of submarine activity has demonstrated that the immunity of a vessel depends very largely on its speed and manoeuvering ability."

There is a possibility that some artificial means of protecting cargo-carrying vessels may be found practicable. In no other field have so many suggestions or so many duplicate inventions been presented to the board."

The Secretary said that the thought of submarine defence may be subdivided in three groups:

1. Methods to accomplish the destruction of submarines, involving detection and destruction after detection.

2. Means of avoiding submarine attack, involving instructions for merchant vessels, proper handling of vessels, camouflage, smoke screens and other confidential information known to American naval authorities.

3. Protection of ships against torpedo hits.

All of the forty thousand suggestions submitted have received careful consideration, Mr. Daniels said, and much valuable aid has been given to various branches of the war service. Many proposals, however, have been found to be impracticable, largely due to the failure of inventors properly to inform themselves of certain fundamental principles.

KILLED BY PLANE.

In Rising, Propeller Struck Woman Spectator.

Georgetown report says: Tragedy followed the landing of a flight cadet of the Royal Flying Corps at this point this afternoon, Mrs. William Cleaves, aged 65, wife of a well-to-do farmer, being killed as a result of being struck by the propeller of the machine when the cadet made an attempt to rise into the air again. The cadet, who declined to give his name even to the coroner, made a landing in a large field just outside the town in a search for gasoline, and while he was supplying his needs a large crowd of citizens gathered, upwards of a hundred being in the field. When the aviator attempted to resume his flight he guided the machine along the ground, but as the field was not large enough to enable him to get up sufficient speed to take to the air, he turned it about and started back down the field. In doing this the aeroplane ran directly into the crowd, several people, mostly children, being knocked down, and Mrs. Cleaves being struck by the propeller. Her body was almost cut in two. The machine was so badly damaged that the cadet could not continue his flight.

REASONS FOR FRENCH CRISIS

Three Causes for Chamber's Adverse Vote

Is Expected to Be Settled Quickly.

A Paris cable says: The Painleve Ministry was defeated by a direct vote in the Chamber of Deputies to-day, and later resigned. This is the first time such action has been taken by the Chamber since the beginning of the war, as up to the present it has been a point of honor with many Deputies not to vote against the Government, but to express criticism by abstaining from recording their votes.

Strong dissatisfaction with the Government's handling of the Bolo Pasha affair is believed to be the motive which changed the passive discontent to active opposition. Two other things thought to have had a part in the downfall of the Painleve Cabinet were the Premier's statement exonerating M. Malvy, the former minister of the interior, and the fiasco attending the prosecution of L'Action Francaise, edited by Leon Daudet, the accuser of M. Malvy.

The Ministerial crisis comes on the eve of the Inter-Allied Conference here, and every effort will be made to settle it quickly.

President Poincare will begin consultations with political leaders to-morrow morning.

HOLLAND WATCHFUL.

Big Credit for Extra War Preparedness.

Amsterdam cable: A supplementary estimate, increasing the extraordinary war credit for 1917 by 100,000,000 florins, has been [illegible]

[illegible] on the same principles as on the war fronts, where operations long have assumed the form of a war of positions and zones at a considerable depth prepared for defence."

ONE GERMAN SPY GAVE SELF AWAY

Tricked by Passenger On Red Sea Steamer

And Paid the Penalty at Sunrise.

A Pacific Port cable: The story of how a German spy betrayed himself was told to-day by Dr. M. A. Jelier, of a steamer that has arrived here from Europe.

On the way out, Dr. Jelier said, there was a passenger on board of charming manners who spoke English and went by the name of Forbes. He showed an unusual interest in military matters and took photographs while passing through the Suez Canal.

Forbes claimed to be Scotch, but Dr. Jelier said that during the journey across the Red Sea he suddenly asked Forbes in German where he was born. Forbes sprang to his feet, and also in German, asked the doctor what he meant, as he was an Englishman.

When the steamer put in at Colombo, Ceylon, the doctor saw Forbes making sketches, and informed the British authorities, who took the man into custody.

Dr. Jelier said he has since learned that Forbes was tried, convicted and shot.

INTER-ALLY WAR COUNCIL IS EXPLAINED

Lloyd George Gives Details of the Newly-Evolved Scheme.

IS ADVISORY

Final Decision Rests With the Separate Governments.

London cable: The proposed new Inter-Allied Council was the subject of discussion in the House of Commons to-day, when the former Premier, H. H. Asquith, brought the matter before the House by interrogating Premier Lloyd George on the functions of the council.

Mr. Asquith asked the Premier whether he would now state the precise functions of the Inter-Allied Council, and, in particular, of its military staff; whether it was proposed that the council if so advised by its staff should have the power to interfere with and override the opinion on a matter of strategy of the general staff at home and the commander-in-chief in the field; whether the military staff of the Inter-Allied Council was to have intelligence and operations departments, or either of them, of its own—whether the ultimate decision as to the distribution and movement of the various armies in the field was to rest on the council or of the Governments represented in it, and whether opportunity would be given to discuss the proposed arrangements and the statements made in connection therewith in the Premier's speech.

TERMS OF AGREEMENT.

Premier Lloyd George in replying to Mr. Asquith, said that the best way of answering the question was to read the actual terms of the agreement between the British, French and Italian Governments for the creation of a supreme council of the Allies. The text of the agreement follows:

"First—With a view to better co-ordination of the military action on the western front a supreme war council is created, composed of the Prime Minister and a member of the Government of each of the great powers whose armies are fighting on that front; the extension of the scope of the council to other fronts to be reserved for discussion with the other great powers.

"Second—The supreme war council has for its mission to watch over the general conduct of the war. It prepares recommendations for the consideration of the Governments, and keeps itself informed of their execution and reports thereon to the respective Governments.

"Third—The general staff and military commands of the armies of each power charged with the conduct of the military operations remain responsible to their respective Governments.

"Fourth—General war plans drawn by competent military authorities are submitted to the supreme war council, which under high authority of Government insures its concordance, and submits, if need be, any necessary changes.

"Fifth—Each power delegates to the supreme war council one permanent military representative, whose exclusive functions is to act as technical adviser to the council.

"Sixth—Military representatives receive from the Government and the competent military authorities of their country all proposals, information and documents relating to the conduct of the war.

"Seventh—The military representatives watch [illegible] the situation of the forces and the means of all kinds of which the allied and enemy armies dispose.

"Eighth—The supreme war council meets normally at Versailles, where the permanent military representatives and staffs are established; they may meet at other places according to circumstances. Meetings of the supreme war council take place at least once a month."

NO EXECUTIVE POWER.

[illegible]

"The object of the allies has been to [illegible] charged with the duty of continuously surveying the conduct of operations as a whole by the light of information derived from all the fronts and from all the Governments and staffs, and of co-ordinating the plans prepared by the different general staffs, and, if necessary, of making proposals of their own for the better conduct of the war."

Mr. Lloyd George announced that the Government has set aside Monday for the discussion of his Paris speech and the proposed council.

Premier Lloyd George finds himself faced by the sharpest crisis of his career as Prime Minister. The crisis is one which may quite possibly result in a vote of want of confidence by the Parliament, which would be followed automatically by his resignation.

Don't move in circles. The fellow who does a lot of running around naturally doesn't get very far ahead.

MEXICAN BATTLE.

Villistas and Government Forces Are Fighting.

Presidio, Texas, report: Fighting between Villa forces and Mexican Government troops began at Ojinaga at 5.20 a.m. (central time). The attack started from the southwest, and grew gradually with the approach of daylight into a constant fire of rifle shots. No artillery, machine guns or hand bombs were used in the first attack.

American patrols are guarding the ford opposite Ojinaga. It is reported bullets are falling on the American side of the Rio Grande.

RICHTHOFEN IS CONFIDENT

Premier Hun Aviator Laughs at U. S. Big Plans.

German Air Fleet is Steadily Increasing.

Copenhagen cable says: Captain Baron von Richthofen, Germany's leading aviator, expresses himself as unconcerned over the reported preparation to place 10,000 American aviators on the western front. He believes it will be impossible to get together that many trained pilots, as the training is long and costly and involves heavy casualties. The newcomers, he said, will, particularly at first, "be unable to judge the military conditions, and at least 25 per cent. of the machines will be disabled during the long transport."

Lieut.-General von Ardenne, of the Berliner Tageblatt, who reports this conversation with Baron Richthofen at the Flanders front, adds that the German air service, which evidently has been forewarned by newspaper discussion of American plans, is steadily increasing the number of aviators and machines.

German fighting airplanes, General von Ardenne says, now carry wireless receiving outfits which enable them to engage in combat promptly with enemy fliers. This is necessitated by new conditions on the Flanders front, where whole squadrons of allied machines can appear over the German lines in a surprisingly short time. German squadrons starting from the ground to meet the invaders would be too late, so they must constantly be in the front lines either flying or ready for flight.

TEUTON RULER GIVEN THE LIE

Emperor Karl Said Anglo-French Offered Peace

And Britain Officially Denies the Claim.

Amsterdam report: According to the Koelnische Volkszeitung Emperor Charles of Austria, referring to the Austro-German alliance, declared that the Central Powers were enabled to defeat the efforts of the world in arms during [illegible] months of war because they were united.

"Several times during the war," said he, "French and British statesmen offered Austria handsome compensations if she would make separate peace."

The Emperor asserted that these efforts undoubtedly had had considerable effect on certain nationalities and parties in Austria-Hungary. But, he added, the Hapsburg and Hohenzollern houses were more closely united than ever, and the Venetian offensive offered a good lesson as to what their post policy should be.

OFFICIALLY DENIED BY BRITAIN.

London cable: Reuter's Limited is officially authorized to issue a categorical denial that British statesmen have approached Austria with a promise of compensations if she would make separate peace.

ITALIAN SPIRIT STIFFENS DAILY

Starve Like the Belgians, but Never Make Peace.

Strong Measures to Stamp Out Hun Treachery.

Rome cable says: The spirit of the Italian people appears to be stiffening daily. The pride of the people has been deeply touched by recent events. There have been many callers at the American Embassy to assure the Ambassador that the nation will resist to the uttermost.

"We have never made peace," exclaims one prominent editor. "We may become homeless; we may starve like the Belgians, but never peace."

While there have been no popular demonstrations of any kind during the past two weeks, the people are calmly determined, and the strongest measures are being taken by the Government to stamp out the activities of Austro-German agents.

The Giornale d'Italia emphasizes that with the United States helping the war cannot be lost; that Italy's ambition has merely postponed final victory.

Curtailing Expense

Many widows and wives receiving separation allowance though their men folk being in the army, have received several pages of questions to be answered.

Since the new Union Government has appointed General Mewburn Minister of Militia there has been a tightening up in his department, and only those properly entitled will henceforth receive separation allowance.

The department's questions to the women are numerous and occasions them a good deal of worry. However, if they are read carefully and thoughtfully a few times the answers will be made easier.

Fine Meeting of Farmers

There was a fine gathering of representative farmers in Port Elgin on Friday afternoon, when Mr. Norman McKay Bruce County's Agricultural Representative, presented to the men the opportunities which the war presented for the raising of more hogs.

Reeve Gilbert Christie was moved to the chair, and after a few remarks called upon the first speaker, Reeve James Johnson, of Underwood. He had attended the meeting at Toronto, which was called by the Minister of Agriculture and at which Food Controller Hanna presented some reasons for hog raising. Mr. Johnson read the pamphlet which the Food Controller had issued, showing the need and the opportunities afforded for profitable raising of hogs.

Messrs. Alex Lamont and J. W. Reany followed Mr. Johnson, after which Mr. MacKay urged that the township be organized which was done. The following were the officers and canvassers appointed:

President—Geo Jamieson.
Secretary—Fred Elliott.
Canvassers for North—R. Webb, W. Pierson, W. Greathead.
Elora Road—J. McDougall, W. Gowanlock, James Gowanlock, R. Teller.
No. 2 Ward.—J. Clazie, Alex Bell, Albert Upshall, G. Leeder, R. Scott, H. Theda.
No 3 ward—A. Lamont. Dan Cairns, W. Howe, A. Brunton, J. J. Hillis.
No 4 ward—J. Wallace, D. Christie. A. J. Lamont, Charles Nelson, D. Currie, C. Kelly.

Among others who were at the meeting, other than those mentioned above were: R. Hanbidge, A. Bell, D. Gowanlock, J. H. Wismer, W. Smith, H. Carr, Duncan Campbell, John Rushton, J. McGillivray, W. McClinton, Wm. Gowanlock, W. Nicholson. The above list of those present is perhaps not complete, and if any names are omitted, it is not intentional.

The meeting was most enthusiastic, and the sentiment patriotic, showing the farmers willing to undertake greater tasks.

The duties of the canvassers are to canvass their districts and endeavor to have every one using one brood sow to keep two sows, in an effort to double the production. To help this production Mr. MacKay told the men that the government was co operating to furnish them with cheap feed, such as millfeeds and corn. The duties and embargoes were being removed, and he urged farmers to co operate with the government and endeavor to bring the cheap feed into this district by the carload. Therefore, it was necessary to begin now to double up in brood sows.

W. C. McFadden Dies Suddenly

The call came suddenly to William McFadden, on Sunday when, with scarcely a moment's warning he passed away from heart failure.

As was usual for him on Sunday morning he, with his family, was found in the family pew at the Methodist church. During the sermon Mrs. McMcFadden noticed her husband become ill. She supported him for a few minutes, and he revived sufficiently to walk, with her aid, to the vestry.

Dr. Wells was hurriedly summoned, and was present in a very few minutes, but before anything could be administered to revive him, Mr. McFadden had passed away.

William McFadden was but 53 years of age, and was a man of fine physique. He was over six feet in height and a powerful man physically. He was a blacksmith by trade, and was known in this district as a whole souled, genial man, whose kindly disposition made him hosts of friends.

He occupied the positions of County constable, and bailiff, and was a member of Port Elgin school board. He was also prominent in Orange lodge circles.

The sudden taking off of husband and father is a great grief for the sorrow-stricken wife and family, and, indeed to the entire community. There are four daughters Misses Lena, Gladys, and Della in Toronto and Nellie and Master LaVerne at home. To them the deepest sympathy will be extended.

The funeral on Tuesday afternoon was very largely attended. The public school was closed, and many parents and scholars were in attendance.

Somewhat Crippled But Willing to Serve

Port Elgin Tribunal receive during their sessions many reason why applicants for exemption should not go to war, but here is a case of a young man aged only 18, and therefore out of the draft, seeking to show the Board why he should be sent. The letter is from Jerry Johns of Chippewa, a brave young Indian warrior, and it is as follows, in part:

"I am applying to Port Elgin tribunal to say that I am willing to serve in some capacity in this war, I am somewhat crippled but can do something, My left arm was dislocated, and is not as good now, not having grown much since my accident. Since war broke out I have been anxious to serve my country and am applying to you to see if you can get me a place where I can be of any help beating the Kaiser, I am willing to go and have no other troubles but my arm, I was rejected once at Toronto. I am a telegraph operator and ready to go to war to do that work, or any kind of scouting, I can talk English and Indian fluently, and have had good training.

Yours truly,
Jerry Johns

Schoolhouse Totally Destroyed by Fire

On Wednesday night of last week the building known as S. S. No. 3, situated just near St. Andrew's church, in Saugeen, was totally destroyed by fire. The building was one of the coziest and neatest in this district, the library being a splendid feature.

About 7 p. m. some neighbors noticed a small light in the school, but thought little of it, until between 8 and 9 o'clock the whole building was seen in flames. The alarm was spread and the neighbors turned out promptly, but nothing could be done to stop the flames.

Only the upper section of a bookcase was saved. A quantity of Red Cross goods were also burned. The building was insured for $1,600, but this will not by any means cover the loss.

A meeting of the trustee board was held on Monday night, the ratepayers being invited to come and give their ideas as to what should be done. The meeting was largely attended and was held in St. Andrew's church and was noted for its splendid harmony. Mr. James Clark was the chairman and A. McKinnon, secretary. After general discussion it was decided to erect a small building at once, in order that the scholars may lose no time. A fine spirit was shown by the ratepayers in volunteering to haul material and do other work to erect a place promptly.

The trustees were instructed to proceed to a call for plans and tenders for a new school building.

Case Transferred

The case of Dr. W. P. Power, who being within the call of the first draft, has been transferred to another tribunal.

Mr. D. J. Izzard a member of the Port Elgin tribunal, informed his associate, Mr Gillies, that for personal reasons he would decline to adjudicate in this case.

The Registrar at London was notified, and he has had the case transferred to another tribunal.

The act states that where a member of a tribunal might have reasons "by interest or kinship" to become disqualified he shall notify the other member, and the Minister of Justice shall be notified, who will appoint another.

Mrs. Phil. Collins Passes Away

After an illness of a few weeks from lung trouble, Mrs Philip Collins passed away Saturday evening.

Deceased had not been very strong for the past year, but was only confined to her bed for the past two weeks.

Deceased came with her husband and family to Port Elgin about seven years ago. There is a family of four small children. To them, and to the bereaved husband much sympathy is extended

Last Chance For Victory Loan

Saturday is the last day for the Victory Loan and unless people make up their minds soon the nine hundred millions of dollars lying in the savings banks drawing only 3 per cent interest will still be there, that is, for the most part. Up to now the Victory Loan has only reached the sum desired, whereas those in charge of the Loan believed the Canadians would raise three hundred millions.

So far as Port Elgin is concerned it is doing well. The objective set for Port Elgin was $20,000, and the canvassers report that they will double it. There are still three more days, and Port Elgin may reach the $50,000 mark.

We have a good record for giving and this old burg will show the way in the matter of loaning Count Port Elgin in—body, soul and spirit, when it comes to winning the war. It has sent the men, is still sending them. Has given money, is still giving it, and now it over subscribes to the Victory Loan nearly 2½ times. Three more days to treble it. Let all try.

According to Walkerton headquarters Walkerton has raised $85,000; Wiarton has raised $15,000 The Herald says some townships have failed to respond. For instance, Brant, whose objective is $76,000, has subscribed so far $30,000; Carrick with an objective of $90,000, has raised $7,000; Greenock with an objective of $14,000 has also raised $7,000, and so on.

The total for Bruce county on Tuesday had reached the $1 0 0,000.

Mr. MacKay, the County secretary, in a letter to The Times says: "The figures from the town of Port Elgin are very encouraging We cannot give too much credit to the way the towns have responded to the good work, Practically all of them have exceeded their objectives by a large margin. The rural districts are the ones who have not responded We have until Saturday next, and if the farmers will rally with their subscriptions Bruce county will come through with flying colors"

Saugeen township is in the honors, for up to Saturday last the Canvassers Messrs Elliott and Jamieson had secured $33,000. The objective placed against Saugeen was $30,000

Bruce Twp. is divided into two parts, or four canvassers. The figures were not available, but Messrs A. McLean, Fullerton, Nelson and MacDonald say the bonds are going well and they hope to beat the objective.

For Arran township particulars are not to hand.

Wants Explanation

To the Editor of The Times

Sir:—In your issue of the 14th inst., there appeared a letter from Mr. J. H. Wismer in regard to the "Light by Meter." Now quite a number of those using the lights would like to have the matter explained, and have been expecting a satisfactory explanation from some representative of the Company, and they hope will yet get it, as Mr. Wismer's reasoning seems just and logical, and they cannot understand what the difference the floor space can make when using same amount of current.

Too Much Money Spent

To the Editor of The Times:

Sir,—I can hardly express myself over the money spent by our people in attending the Marks Bros. show, when the money is so much needed in France add Belgium. The Company charged 50 cents for all seats. Do these men think it right when there is such a war going on that they should not be doing something to win it?

Nehemiah rebuilds the walls of Jerusalem.—Nehemiah 4: 1-23. Print 4: 7-21.

COMMENTARY.—I. Enemies deride the builders (vs. 1-6). The enemies of the Jews were promptly on hand to oppose the work of improving conditions in Judah. Jerusalem had lain in ruins for nearly a century and a half, and had been a prey to surrounding nations. When the people round about saw an effort being made to rebuild the walls, they ridiculed the attempt, declaring that the Jews were too feeble for so great an undertaking. The words of Sanballat and Tobiah in vs. 2, 3 express the estimate which they placed upon the Jews' ability to restore Jerusalem and the nation. They flattered themselves into believing that the thing which they did not want done was impossible of accomplishment. As an offset to this derision Nehemiah betook himself again to prayer, committing the entire case to Jehovah, yet used his utmost diligence to carry forward the work already begun. The entire wall was apportioned to forty-four different companies and they worked so faithfully that the breaches were all closed in fifty-two days (Neh. 6: 15), building "every one over against his house" (Neh. 3: 28). The wall was built up to half of its original height the entire distance. From discoveries made by Sir Charles Warren it has been estimated that the most ancient wall was built up to half of its original height the entire distance. From discoveries made by Sir Charles Warren it has been estimated that the most ancient wall was built to a height of two hundred feet.

II. A conspiracy formed (vs. 7-12). 7. Sanballat—An officer of the Persian government, who had authority in Samaria. He is chiefly noted for his hostility to the Jews. He is called "the Horonite" (Neh. 2: 10), probably from Horonaim, a city in Moab. Tobiah—He was an Ammonite Neh. 2. 10). The Moabites and the Ammonites were enemies of the Jews, and this fact may account for their bitter hostility to the plan of rebuilding the walls. Arabians—Wandering tribes of the desert probably under the leadership of Geshem (Neh. 2: 19). Ammonites—A people having their home to the east of the Jordan. Ashdodites—The inhabitants of Ashdod, a city of the Philistines, near the Mediterranean Sea. Were very wroth — They were angry when they heard of the Jews' purpose to rebuild the walls and their anger increased when they knew that the work was actually being done. They construed the act of the Jews in fortifying the city as an attempt to throw off the Persian yoke, but the real cause of their anger seems to have been a jealousy because of the increasing power and prosperity of the Jews, and, moreover, Jerusalem fortified would no longer be an open field for plunder. 8. Conspired ..Together — Literally "breathed together in unison." The hostility of these peoples toward the Jews was great enough for the time being to unite them in their opposition to the plan of fortifying Jerusalem. There is no account of their having put their conspiracy into action. 9. We made our prayer unto God—Nehemiah was a man of prayer; his prayers had thus far brought success in his important undertaking, and he believed the Lord would not fail him at this critical moment, and set a watch—Watching and prayer are brought together in their proper relation. On the part of the enemies of the Jews there were ridicule, hatred and conspiracy; but on the part of the Jews, prayer, watching and concentration of purpose to carry out the divinely-appointed plan. 10. Judah said..we are not able — Nehemiah met opposition, not only from without, but even from his own people, who harbored a spirit of discouragement. There was a great amount of rubbish, which must be removed to found a foundation and to secure building material, and it was a great height to which stones must be raised to build the walls. 11. Our adversaries said—The plan of the enemy was to make a sudden and secret attack upon the Jews with the purpose of utterly routing them and permanently hindering the work of repairing the walls. 12. The Jews which dwelt by them—The Jews in scattered communities, dwelling among the Samaritans and other enemies.

III. Nehemiah's defence (vs. 13-18). 13. In the lowest parts ... in the open places (R. V.) — Nehemiah placed guards behind the workers in the exposed places where the walls were not yet raised high enough for protection. after their families—Both the defenders and those working on the walls at any given place belonged to the same family. 14. be not ye afraid of them—It was known that an attack was likely to be made by the Jews' enemies. Nehemiah had done his best in organizing the workers and the defenders. He had prayed earnestly to the Lord, and with confidence he could encourage his people to be brave and strong. fight for your brethren, etc. The strongest incentives were placed before them. "To the Jews the contest must be to their very existence as a people." 15. when our enemies heard—The enemies expected to keep secret the plan of their attack, but it became known to the Jews. 16. half of my servants—Reference is probably made to Nehemiah's band of personal servants. They were divided into two companies, and half working at rebuilding walls and the other guarding against the enemies. habergeons—Coats of mail, protections for the body, made of metal or coarse leather. rulers were behind—They took their position behind the workers to direct the work of building, and to direct the defence in case an attack should be made. 17. bare burdens—The burden-bearers needed but one hand for their work, so they were free to use the other for defence. 18. his sword—The builders carried their swords in their girdles, where they could be grasped quickly, if needed.

IV. The builders at work (vs. 19-23). 19. nobles—Those who were descended from the royal family of David and honored as such. rulers—Officials of Jerusalem. separated—The workmen and the defenders were scattered far as they labored on the whole extent of the wall. 20. our God shall fight for us—These words came fittingly from the man who had made use of his own skill in pushing forward the work and in guarding the workmen, and had prayed in faith for the success of the undertaking which he was certain was divinely directed. 21. so we labored—The energy with which the work was advanced appears from the fact that the workmen were busy from daylight until dark.

Questions — Who was Nehemiah? Why had he gone to Jerusalem? What did he do first? How did the people receive his plan? How were they opposed? How did Nehemiah meet their opposition? What complaint did the men of Judah make? Why? How did Nehemiah learn the plan of his enemies? How did he arrange to meet their forces? What appeal did Nehemiah make to the people? How did his plan effect his enemies? How did he arrange to complete the work? What was the need of a trumpeter?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Opposition.

I. Tested loyalty and devotion.

II. Met skill and perseverance.

I. Tested loyalty and devotion. It was exasperating news to Sanballat that Nehemiah had come from Shushan to Jerusalem with a commission from Artaxerxes to rebuild the walls of the city. He and his friends had at first thought it impossible that Nehemiah would attempt to repair and restore the city. When they found the work progressing, they gave vent to their wrath in scoffs and ridicule. Sanballat was most irritating to Nehemiah and taunted him bitterly. He sought in every way to check the work by abuse of its official leader. He combined open opposition with mockery. As his custom was, Nehemiah betook himself to the divine Comforter and there poured out his wounded feelings in prayer. The good work of Nehemiah was in serious danger from the craft and violence of its foes and from the faint hearted of its friends. There were enemies without and difficulties within. Tobiah with others was acquainted with the internal state of Jerusalem. Through his influence much evil was wrought. He showed contempt for the efforts of Nehemiah. He ridiculed the plans of the people and kept up a constant intrigue with those within who were disaffected. His pleas of friendship were a greater detriment than the threats of enmity. They were far more likely to weaken the forces than the intimidation of pronounced foes. Geshem was a characterless man. He brought false charges against Nehemiah, as one who only wished to set up a sovereignty and to become independent of the central power at Shushan. He was a most dangerous opposer, for he could insinuate that unprincipled motives were back of all Nehemiah's efforts. From sneers and taunts his enemies laid plots and conspiracies to overthrow his work by force. Nehemiah was so absorbed in the restoration that the enthusiasm of his patriotic purpose quickened the hearts of the people with an energy that never let go until the work was done.

II. Met skill and perseverance. Having set his hand to the work, Nehemiah judiciously employed every means calculated to promote it. He first sought divine direction, then employed means upon which he implored the divine blessing. In no other way could the work have progressed and been successfully completed in so short a time. Nehemiah resisted his foes by pressing all his people into service, by inspiring them with confidence in God, by insisting that there be no parleying with the enemy. It was necessary to present a bold and united front to the enemy and to be soldiers as well as builders. Only by zeal, diligence and unity could they hope, under the blessing of God, to encircle Jerusalem with walls and bulwarks. Recognizing their weakness and dependence and regardless of discouragements, they prayed. They combined prayer and watchfulness with precept and example. As difficulties thickened, Nehemiah's courage rose, his capacity became more evident and his ability to sway the many was unquestioned. Full of confidence and resolution, he inspired others with like feelings. They built the wall notwithstanding sneers, active opposition or despairing friends. They built the wall by prayer, by working together, by the willingness on the part of each to do his best and by courageous trust in God. There was thoroughness and discouragement and opposition. Consecration, zeal and activity, diligent use of appointed means, fortitude and perseverance with entire dependence upon the blessing of God characterized the builders in their efforts to upbuild their sacred city. Nehemiah acted as architect, general, diplomatist. The contempt of the Samaritans was wholly misplaced. The wall grew rapidly under the busy hands nerved and stimulated as they were to do their best. Jerusalem was to be no longer [illegible] Samaria, [illegible] and Sanballat, [illegible] away the rubbish was a [illegible] and depressing task, entailing much toil and little show of progress for a time. God's help encouraged exertion. The builders did their secular work in a religious spirit. They not only began well, but they persevered to the end of their work. T. R. A.

SHOULD GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE PRICE OF HOGS?

With Shorts Selling at $45 per Ton the Price of Hogs Should be $16.13—Why Farmers Should Raise More Hogs—By Daniel McKee, B.S.A.

On account of grave food shortage in Europe the government is making an appeal to all Canadian farmers to breed as many sows as they can this fall, so as to increase the supply of hogs next spring. The Food Controller, the Hon. W. J. Hanna, in opening the campaign for greater hog production at a meeting of farmers and district representatives held in Parliament Buildings, Toronto, on November 6, said that never was there a greater need for increased production than at the present time, and that if farmers did not make every effort to increase the supply of food our Allies in France would be reduced to something approaching starvation. There was a shortage of 32,425,000 hogs in Europe, and he appealed to Canadian farmers to make good this shortage by raising more hogs.

Mr. Hanna's remarks concerning the profits to be made in raising hogs would have carried a good deal more weight with the audience if he had declared that the government would guarantee a minimum price for hogs and safeguard farmers against loss. He said that if the Canadian Government guaranteed the price of hogs, it would be the equivalent of a forced loan to the Allied Powers, and the Canadian government required all the money it had for other purposes. If prices for hogs are going to be high, as the speaker declared they would be, the government would not lose a cent by guaranteeing a minimum price for hogs. To tell farmers that hog raising is going to be profitable, and then refuse to guarantee a minimum price, is inconsistent. The law of supply and demand makes prices lower when the market is glutted with a surplus of hogs, just as it makes prices high when there is a shortage.

Unless the government is prepared to guarantee the price of hogs, it should not advance increased profits as an argument for raising hogs, but base its appeal solely on humanitarian considerations and the grave—very grave—need of more foodstuffs.

For the campaign to succeed the government must get the confidence of the farmers. It will get the confidence of the farmers if the gravity of the situation is placed before them and it asks them to produce solely for patriotic reasons. But to introduce profits into the appeal, when the price of hogs is not guaranteed, arouses distrust at once. The profit argument should be left severely alone.

There is no reason of course why the government should guarantee prices, outside of the fact that when munitions were required the manufacturers were guaranteed a fair profit, and as one farmer remarked, "What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander."

When a general asks his troops to charge the enemy he does not guarantee that they will not get killed or wounded. It is said that Hector Macdonald, before the battle of Paardeberg in the South African war, told the Highlanders that they would have to wade through blood up to their knees. The soldier gives his all, and the least that those who remain at home can do is to make certain, as far as lies in their power, that the cause for which the soldiers are giving their lives or suffering torture, both physical and mental, day after day, without a grumble, should succeed. Mr. Hanna and those closely in touch with the food situation in France and England say it is vitally necessary that we have more hogs, and when the farmers of Canada realize the seriousness of the situation they will produce as many hogs as they can, even if they have to sell them at cost or even at a loss.

Unless a definite ratio is fixed between the price of hogs and the price of feed, no one can tell whether hogs will be produced at a profit or a loss during the next few years. The United States government has appointed a commission to determine a fair ratio between the price of corn and the price of hogs.

There is room for a good deal of difference of opinion as to what the best grain would be to compare the price of hogs with here in Canada. Although corn is used in certain sections of this country quite extensively as hog feed, these sections are limited. Oats is the most widely grown grain crop in Ontario, there being almost three times as many acres sown to oats this year as there were sown to fall wheat, which is the next most widely grown grain crop. Although oats is excellent feed for horses and cattle, it is not suitable for feeding to pigs except in mixtures, and then it should only constitute a small part of the ration, as it contains too much crude fibre. Shorts or middlings cannot be beaten for pigs, and we are fairly safe in assuming that shorts or middlings is the most widely used meal in Ontario.

The average top price for hogs on the off car basis at the Union Stock Yards, Toronto, for the last ten years was $9.25. The average price for shorts over a similar period of years was $25.84 per ton, or $1.29 per hundredweight. This means that the price of 7.17 hundredweights of shorts was necessary to induce farmers to stay in hog raising business. When hogs were selling for more than the price of 7.17 hundredweights of shorts hog raising was comparatively profitable, but when hogs were selling for less than the price of 7.17 hundredweights of shorts hog raising was comparatively unprofitable.

Although we say that during certain years hog raising was relatively unprofitable, we do not mean that a man was necessarily actually losing money during these years. We simply mean that during these years hog raising was not as profitable as it was on the average.

What the future holds for the hog producer so far as profits are concerned, it is extremely difficult to say with any degree of accuracy unless a definite ratio is fixed between the price of feed and the price of hogs. It is certain, however, that the business aspects of the situation will have little weight in deciding Canadian farmers whether they will raise more hogs. When men enlist to go to the front, they do not consider the business advantages of shooting and being shot at, for there are none. They hold the front line trenches because they feel it their duty to do so. It has been said farmers never start a war but always finish it, and they can help to finish this one by producing more hogs.

—The Canadian Countryman.

SUNDAY AT HOME

A HOME SONG.

I read within a poet's book
  A word that starred the page:
"Stone walls do not a prison make,
  Nor iron bars a cage!"

Yes, that is true, and something more
  You'll find where'er you roam,
That marble floors and gilded walls
  Can never make a home.

But every house where love abides,
  And Friendship is a guest,
Is surely home, and home-sweet-home:
  For there the heart can rest.

—Henry Van Dyke.

Brethren, pray for us.

Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up. Pray one for another, that ye may be healed.

The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain: and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit.

Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all the perseverance and supplication for all saints.

Without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers.—Always laboring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God.

REAL TIME.

A man said, "Am I actually free, or is my liberty of action only ignorance of conditions that determine my actions?"

What we really mean when we ask, "Are we free?" is, whether we act, we really create. It has been said that life is a creation, and that the reality of the universe is incessant creation. Man is oppressed by illusions. In ordinary thought and language we represent space and time as two realities.

In space material objects lie outside one another, like barrels on a wharf, and in time when they succeed each other—as barrels rolling down a plank. Now, the time which we imagine is only a symbolical representation of space. When we think of states succeeding each other, we are not thinking of time at all but of space.

Real time, the true duration, is entirely different. It is not a succession. Time does not run. Like a bird, it does not fly, but, like life, it is here—an actually present, moving, changing now. In the mind states do not lie outside one another, like barrels, but interpenetrate, and the whole individual consciousness changes without ceasing. It is only in space that one thing is outside another thing. In real change there are no states at all. Everything is a living, moving present.

Existence in time is life, it is a whole life (holy). Life is not measurable at all. You cannot count conscious states. They are not quantities, but pure qualities; and outside and distinct from one another, but interpenetrating and permeating the living individual, who is seen to be the creative power of the individual who is one and indivisible.

One star differeth from another star in glory. But each moves in the magnificence and majesty of an entire and positive whole. Men are too prone to count quantities like dollars. They are slow to estimate qualities. It would be difficult to count the bubbles of the ocean, but a child can dip its cup and taste the quality of the sea. The Master said, "I am the light of the world, and He said, "Ye are the light of the world." He also said, "Ye are the salt of the earth." Perhaps He said this of Himself, though it is not recorded, but we know this living effusion rises like a cloud and gives the atmosphere of the heavenly places, thus preventing for ever the bad smell of earth rising to contaminate the sweet beauty of the saints. "Blessed are the pure in heart"—they know all things. That is, they know the quality of all things, both in heaven and in earth.

"I create the fruit of the lips." The words of the tongue are His, and as they come forth they become the property of the speaker. It is the glory of man that he can utter the words of the Most High. Life is a continuous creation. Man is a partner of God. How inscrutible is the fellowship of God and man—His ways are past finding out!

What "Amen" Means.

Amen is a Hebrew word signifying "so be it," "truly" [illegible] the amen is [illegible] by the congregation at the conclusion of the benediction. Among the early Christians the prayer offered by the Presbytery was concluded by the word "amen" uttered by the congregation. Justin Martyr is the earliest of the fathers who alludes to the use of the response. At the conclusion of a prayer it signifies, according to the English church catechism, "so be it"; after the repetition of the creed, "so it is."

Acts of the Apostles.

The weight of testimony is in favor of St. Luke as the author of the Acts of the Apostles, though some respectable critics claim that the authorship is quite unknown. There are no sure data for determining the date of the Acts. Various dates have been ascribed. Some think that it was written about the year 80, while others hold that it could not have been written before the second century, about A. D. 125.

Reprisals? Don't worry. Germany has supplied civilization with an eternal one."

Chats with the Doctor

HERPES.

Herpes is a skin disease which appears in two or three forms, and is a painful as well as a disfiguring affection. Perhaps the most common form is that known as Herpes facialis, in which the eruption appears on the lips or face, the usually the former. Indeed it is sometimes called H. labialis, though this is too narrow a definition. It shows itself first as a sensation of itching and burning, usually on or near the lips, developing into a swollen reddish patch, which latter becomes covered with small blisters. Though the patches most commonly appear singly, there may be two or three, which soon meet and run into each other. If the blisters are scratched they dry up into hard scabs and fall off in anything from a week to a fortnight, and the patient is cured till the next attack, which is almost inevitable. People subject to this affection will suffer for almost any small derangement of health, a chill or slight digestive trouble being quite sufficient to cause an outbreak. Sometimes exposure to strong sunshine is responsible. If the patches are scratched and dirt allowed to get into them the consequences may become much more serious and the more difficult of treatment.

Treatment is only ever possible to a limited extent, but attention to the general health will do a great deal in the way of prevention. When the first signs of the attack show themselves—and these are usually easily recognized by habitual sufferers—bathing the part with very hot water or painting it with flexible collodion will sometimes restrict it in area and severity. Once the blisters have actually developed the utmost care should be taken to prevent their rupture, but when they are situated, as is frequently the case, on the red part of the lips, this is practically impossible. The application during the attack of a lotion consisting of [illegible] grains of nitrate of silver in one [illegible] and [illegible] seems to lessen the frequency of the attacks, and may help to a real cure.

Herpes Zoster, or shingles, as it is popularly called, appears on the body, and its habit of forming a band round the back and chest like a girdle is accountable for its name, "Zoster" meaning a girdle, and "Cingulum"—whence "shingles," being the Latin form of the same word. The symptoms and early appearance of this form of the disease are the same as of the facial kind, but it covers far wider areas of skin and is accompanied by far more serious pain and disturbance of the health. If neglected, and particularly if the blisters become purulent, there may be considerable scarring, and in elderly persons the pain is continuous and severe. Very little treatment is possible beyond cleanliness. Free powdering of the affected parts with a disinfectant powder, such as boric acid powder, and the application of cotton wool pads held in place by a bandage is as good a local treatment as any. Where the eruption has ulcerated, scrupulous cleanliness is necessary, and an antiseptic ointment should be kept continually renewed. This will also help to keep the skin soft, and lessen the risk of scarring.

THE FATALITY OF SCARLET FEVER.

The records of various outbreaks of scarlet fever in the past show a most curious variation in the fatality of the disease. This variation is noticeable not only in epidemics separated both in time and locality, but in outbreaks which have occurred simultaneously and in [illegible] neighborhood. So, also, the nature of an epidemic is often known to change during its course, the fatality usually becoming much less as the outbreak wears on.

Early records show these changes in virulence to a marked degree. Thus in [illegible] of Tours from the year [illegible] to [illegible] no death from scarlet fever was observed, but in the year [illegible] a most malignant form of the disease raged both in the town and its neighborhood. The epidemic in Dublin in [illegible] was severely fatal, but the following year the type changed entirely, and for twenty-seven years the only form of the disease which appeared was a very mild one. At the end of this time the old severe form reappeared and remained. In Australia the form of disease is a uniformly mild one, with the exception of one outbreak in Melbourne in [illegible], which ravaged the city.

No connection has yet been traced between this variation and any influence of soil, condition, or climate. There seems to be a slight increase of fatality in the summer and winter months, as compared with the spring and autumn, but this is so slight as to be negligible.

Origin of the Jury System.

A jury is a body of laymen summoned and sworn to ascertain the truth as to facts raised in legal proceedings. The jury system of the United States developed from that of England. This in turn had its origin in Frankish inquest, which was translated into England by Norman kings. In these inquests a body of neighbors was summoned by a public officer to give answer upon oath on some question of fact or law or of mixed fact and law. In the beginning the object of the inquiry was usually to obtain information for the king to ascertain facts needed for assessing taxes.

Has been Canada's favorite yeast for over a quarter of a century. Bread baked with Royal Yeast will keep fresh and moist longer than that made with any other, so that a full week's supply can easily be made at one baking, and the last loaf will be just as good as the first.

Through Many Trials

"Beg pardon there, sir! You going on, sir?" the guard inquires with curt courtesy, as he bustles up to perform the double duty of locking the door and escorting some first-class passengers into a carriage. "Plenty of room here, madame," he adds deferentially, to the portly, superb dame who is moving with leisurely dignity along the platform, and to Dumaresq's intense vexation the guard unlocks the carriage door where Imogene is.

It certainly wants only three minutes to the time of departure, but he is hot with "envy, hatred and malice" against the guard, the lady and the lady's escort—a tall, thin, ungainly young lad of one-and-twenty or two-and-twenty—for the loss of those last minutes alone with his darling.

"Rudolf," she says, laughingly, "you can go and look for her, you know, and bring her—"

When "Rudolf" interrupts her eagerly:

"Why, mother, here is Miss Trefusis!"

"Really! How delightful!" the stout lady says, putting up her gold pince-nez with one hand over her dainty, spangled veil, and with the other gathering the skirts of her splendid, brocaded velvet mantle about her as she steps into the carriage, favoring Dumaresq with a very cold stare, which he returns with interest, for he is anything but prepossessed with the appearance of "Rudolf" or his mamma, who is an over-dressed, under-bred looking woman of fifty with powder-laden cheeks and Kohl-painted eyes, and buttress curls and braids of daffodil hues.

"My dearest child! This is so charming," she says, gushingly, shaking hands with Imogene, while her small, crafty eyes are scanning her face and Dumaresq's presence with hostile criticism. "Dear Lady Petherick said to me only this morning, 'How I wish my sister could travel with you when you are going down to Exeter!' but we scarcely hoped for the pleasure. Did we, Rudolf?"

"No, indeed, mother," Rudolf says, awkwardly, eyeing Dumaresq much as his maternal parent has done, haughtily, but uneasily.

"Lady Petherick will be so pleased," the lady goes on, gushing still, but with an effort; "she regretted your having to travel, with only a maid, so much!"

"I am traveling alone, Lady Bankes," Imogene says, very coldly and distinctly; "Lady Petherick's woman came with me to see to my luggage, but she has gone home again."

"And you are really quite alone!" Lady Bankes exclaims, looking quite shocked, and then darting a suspicious glance at Dumaresq again.

But Imogene neither heeds her nor hears her, for the parting moment has come, and quite regardless of Lady Bankes or "Rudolf," she remains by the carriage door with Dumaresq standing beside her.

"Friends going to travel with you?" he queries, with a dubious glance at the tulle veil and the powdered face and the sumptuous attire.

"No. Friends of Sir William," Imogene says, very briefly, with the least disdainful upraising of her delicate dark brows. "I know very little of her. I wonder Evelyn wished them to be with me."

"They do not look congenial to you, certainly," Dumaresq says, with a look into the fair, high-bred countenance. "I wonder, too, Lady Petherick could choose them for your escort."

"So do I," assents Imogene. "They are very wealthy people."

And then Dumaresq wonders less.

"That is Lady Bankes' son?" he asks, in a low tone.

"Yes; the only child," Imogene says, with a droll little moue. "He doesn't look as if he was particularly blessed, after all; yet they say he will be heir to a quarter of a million of money."

And then Dumaresq wonders no more why the pompous, under-bred woman and her son have been chosen by Lady Petherick as her sister's companions on a long railway journey.

"I envy him from the depths of my soul!" he says, with a sudden fierce bitterness that startled her, "his quarter of a million in perspective, and—his two hundred miles and odd of a journey with you!"

"Why should you?" she asks, in a whisper, blushing like the heart of a rose.

And Dumaresq looks at the sweet, flushed face with another bitter smile.

"Why should I, indeed?" he echoes. "Because 'that way madness lies' for me. I told you so before."

"But—why?" she persists, softly.

"Because I have nothing left but to say farewell to you," he says; "nothing left but jealous despair, Imogene."

The whistle has actually sounded, the train has actually given its preliminary start and began to glide onward, but Imogene is only conscious of Richard Dumaresq's passionate eyes gazing at her in desperate yearning, and of Richard Dumaresq's goodly five feet ten of manhood standing so close beside her that she can almost feel the throbbings of his heart; and in that moment of parting, and grief and bitterness, her timid, girlish love flies forth on the strong wings of a woman's unseeking passion.

"You need not," she mutters, standing up; and he keeps close hold of her little hand, as he clings to the carriage door a few moments, and is thereby nearly meeting a cruel death at the hands of his gentle young love; "you need not—I love you, Richard!"

Five minutes later, walking on in a reverie of sweet and painful thoughts just outside Paddington station, Richard Dumaresq is passed close by Lady Petherick's carriage.

And Lady Petherick sees him, and sees where he has been, and in a moment perceives she has been outgeneraled.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"I wish you were in the diplomatic service, Sir William," Lady Petherick says, thoughtfully.

"Indeed!" he retorts, grumpily, "why may I ask? Think I should do better than in the city? I don't."

"No better in a monetary sense," Sir William's beautiful young wife says, with a slight arching of her shining dark brows, "but I should like it so much. I should like to be an embassadress, for instance," she smiles to herself, with a soft, inscrutable smile. "I should like to be a power in politics—a leader of a party. I should so enjoy the excitement of the intrigues, the plotting and counter-plotting!" she laughs in a half-defiant, regretful way. "If my husband were a member of the cabinet I should be in my proper sphere!"

"It is a great pity you are not in your proper sphere, then," Sir William retorts, surlily.

"It is," Evelyn says, airily; "for I am sure I have wonderful talents lying perdu. Hidden in a napkin, so to speak—unknown, untried, lost to society."

Sir William Petherick's gray eyebrows lower gloomily as he listens to [illegible] of her proud, perfect loveliness—which will bloom into full blown beauty in years to come; and, in twenty years to come, when, in all human likelihood, he will be mouldering in the grave.

He cannot read her thoughts as she sits there, reclining on the luxurious pillow-cushioned couch, covered with olive satin, looking like a picture in her quaintly-fashioned aesthetic teagown of pale-yellow, soft, figured silk, short-waisted and falling straight to her feet, where it is narrowed by being gathered into a flounce.

She has copied it [illegible] from a picture, and the soft, old gold brocaded silks is as [illegible] eighteenth century [illegible], and as the tea-gown, with its quaint [illegible] and its old-world [illegible] pattern, ruffled with soft [illegible] yellow lace, is a triumph of aesthetic elegance and picturesqueness, and the envy and despair of Lady Petherick's friends.

She has chosen it carefully, and worn it especially on this afternoon, and her husband does not even dimly imagine why she has donned one of the choicest, prettiest gowns in her wardrobe, and chosen to remain at home under the plea of a headache.

He does not venture to intrude on her too long—the surly, elderly husband plays a very smart part, indeed, in the drama of the beauty's life—and so Sir William [illegible] takes his departure, and goes about some of his heavy, sordid, gold-making schemes—the real and only pleasure of his slow, sordid, money-getting existence, and leaves his young wife to enjoy herself.

"I thought he was never going!" she cries, springing up with a yawn of relief; "insufferable poor old dear! It is actually 3 o'clock, and I told him to be punctual. What a narrow escape from having the poor old man doing watchdog duty the whole livelong afternoon! He would not have stirred an inch, if the city itself was to be burned down!"

And she laughs heartily at the ideas which suggest themselves to her mind: visions of Sir William's jealousy, and her own clever policy in allaying and blinding the same.

As she lies there and counts the minutes, and waits and listens, the knock and ring come for which she waits; and Evelyn Petherick rises from the couch with hurried, uneven steps, to look at herself in the mirror, frightened at herself to feel the wild throbbing of her heart, and to know that the blood forsakes cheeks and lips. She is pale, yet with the lovely pallor of excitement, as her visitor enters the room, and there are delicate violet shadows beneath the silken lashes of her languid, dark, soft eyes.

He notices it all, and wonders even now at her loveliness, and pardons her a great deal, as men will pardon a woman for the beauty of her complexion and the length of her dark eyelashes.

"And yet you will not come to my dinner-parties!" she says, gently reproachful, when he thanks her ardently and gratefully for all the kindness of words and promises, advice and assurances which she gives him during their tete-a-tete interview, which has lasted more than an hour—more than an hour and a half, indeed, indeed, shut up in my lady's charming little sitting-room, where even Sir William does not dare to intrude too much—Lady Petherick and Mr. Richard Dumaresq, with her ladyship's French waiting-woman keeping guard against intrusion or disturbance in an adjoining room. The bland, courteous, bright-eyed young person has succeeded to the post of my lady's continental maid, vice Shaw, the ill-tempered, summarily dismissed a week ago, on the day of her return from a certain unlucky visit to her sister, when she ought to have remained on the platform at Paddington.

It is a week to-day since Imogene Trefusis returned to Cornwall, and since Dumaresq's meeting with Lady Petherick, and her gracious invitation to dine at her house, which invitation he has declined with an apology, after one thought.

And yet, neither angered, nor offended, nor tired of trying to befriend him, apparently, Lady Petherick has written to him. She knows his address, although he never gave it to her, and asked him to call on her today at three o'clock; and she has received him as the kindest of friends—of sisters—might do.

"You know I apologized, Lady Petherick," he says, flushing a little uncomfortably, in an answer to her gentle, sisterly reproach. "I apologized, after having time to consider the information you kindly gave me that Captain Dumaresq had received an invitation likewise, and that you were anxious for us to meet and be friends. I told you, Lady Petherick," he continues, firmly, "that I had no wish to meet Captain Dumaresq in enmity, but I certainly could not meet him in friendship."

"You certainly could, and you certainly ought," Lady Petherick retorts, as firmly. "You know we must forgive our enemies, the Bible tells us" she adds, with sweet pious fervency, emphasized by the upraising of her beautiful eyes and a flash of a diamond fire from the rings on her clasped hands.

Richard Dumaresq sees the gesture, and apprehends it at its true worth, and it disenchants him a little, but he looks on her again and forgives. He listens to the music of her voice, and sits in the sunlight of her smiles until she half bewitches him half persuades him, and he yields to her wishes, and gives assent to her suggestions, and suffers half-willingly the silken meshes of her influence to wind closer and closer about him, and surrenders his pride and self-will as a sacrifice to her, in return for her kind sympathy, her sisterly friendship—so he persuades himself.

So when he rises to go away he has pledged himself to love [illegible] Petherick in various ways. To visit at her house when she thinks well to invite him, to suffer her gentle mediation between him and his cousin—"You are both my friends, you must be friends with each other," she says, sweetly—and to accept her good offices to obtain him a situation—through Sir William—of foreign correspondent for a city house.

For this last promise Dumaresq is warmly, intensely grateful to her, and she does seem once more a goddess of good to him—friendless, without money or prospects as he is, earning a temporary income from his old friend, the Irish army surgeon, Dr. O'Driscoll, for whom he does work of an evening, translating from French and assisting on certain days in the week the dispenser in the military hospital to which Dr. O'Driscoll is attached.

But the pay is small, the work tiresome and continuous, and worse than all can be but a temporary arrangement, and when Lady Petherick talks of Sir William's "unlimited influence" with rich city firms, and alludes, as a matter of course, to a salary of "three or four hundred a year, until something better occurs," Dumaresq could almost worship her for her goodness.

Only—he wonders vaguely, with a lurking sense of doubt and uncertainty shadowing the brightness of his anticipations—wherefore—wherefore this frank friendship this keen, kind interest in his welfare, this sisterly sympathy?

From a wealthy young bride, too, newly married, newly surrounded with the pleasures and distractions of wealth. And he persuades himself, or tries to persuade himself, that here lies the sad, secret reason.

That her generous, loving, womanly nature—a nature in some degree akin to Imogene's—yearns for some warmer, kindlier interests to fill her empty life, her lonely heart, whose cravings wealth cannot satisfy.

"I am parted, you see, from all my old associates, from my home, and all I love," she says once, with gentle pathos, adding with a little hurried, half-smothered sigh, "and my husband is so much my senior, he cannot be expected to take an interest in what I take an interest in."

But Dumaresq's [illegible] cleverly holds his peace, and does not commit the folly of sympathizing with a lovely wife of twenty respecting her husband's forty years' seniority.

"You must have found it pleasant having your sister here," is all he says in reply, determined to introduce Imogene's name into the conversation for the first time during the hour and a half which his visit has lasted. Lady Petherick has avoided the least allusion to her hitherto.

"Oh, yes; only too pleased if she would stay always with me," she says, with a half-sad little smile, "but, of that I have no hope."

"Do you know that I saw Miss Trefusis at Paddington the day she left?" he asks, deliberately. "I happened to go with some friends to see two of the party off, on Thursday afternoon, and met your sister, saw her and spoke to her. I had quite understood you to say she was returning on Saturday."

But there is no consciousness, no embarrassment in Lady Petherick's soft smile of inquiry and placid interest, as she says:

"Yes? She went on Tuesday in consequence of a letter from home. Poor, dear Lionel was not so well, and so nothing would induce Imogene to remain away any longer."

"Yes. She told me Lionel was worse," Richard Dumaresq says, and waits for another question respecting his meeting with Imogene, but none comes.

"Can it be possible that she knows nothing?" he asks himself repeatedly; "or is this merely her evidence of proud, quiet displeasure—this utter ignoring of the subject?"

It is a gentle and ladylike method of evincing her feelings, however, and he can no more blame her for it than for them.

But it worries and distresses him, nevertheless. It makes itself up with that rather perplexing "wherefore?" and when he takes leave of Lady Petherick he carries the perplexing problem away with him to solve.

"For," she says, with a pretty, arch kindliness of manner, clasping his strong, sinewy hand with both her tiny white bejeweled ones in farewell, "you must come again—one day next week. I will write to you and fix the day." This is said with an espieglerie and drollery of sparkling glance and meaning smile which quite bewilders him—honest, plain soldier as he is.

"For I want to see you very particularly," she says, smiling up into his eyes. "I have a great deal to tell you; a great deal that will surprise you, I fear, but give you pleasure ultimately, I hope. You must come. More depends on it than you perhaps imagine."

"I will certainly come, Lady Petherick. Thank you a thousand times for your kindness to me," Dick says, huskily, in his emotion, his face flushing to the roots of his crisp, shining brown hair, consciousness in his face, rapture in his eyes telling all too plainly to the woman who watches him, what secret, sudden hope her words have kindled into life. A hope which concerned not her, a vision in which she, despite her warm, radiant presence, is to him but a cold shadow, rapture which she could never create, in which she has no share.

And the deadly sickness of a wrathful despair comes over her, with an ivory pallor overspreading her bright, flushed face, and a mist of bitter tears in her violet eyes. She looks strangely like Imogene at the moment, and Dick Dumaresq, in his new-born, passionate gratitude, looks at her with deeper, intenser admiration, and her eyelids droop until the long, silken lashes touch her cheek.

"I told you I meant to be your friend," Lady Petherick says, in a soft murmur, looking up at him once more with those tear-wet, [illegible] eyes, and her little, soft, white hands, with their clustering rings, press his fingers gently.

Think nationally, not politically, then vote.

If winter has come to stay this early the coal problem may be a serious one before spring.

Election !
Victory Loan !
Military Service Act !
What a slump after these are over ! No wonder people are irritable.

One thing sure, the voting in this election will be much mixed. Men will change their party affiliations for the first time, and it will be a good thing. How foolish to follow blindly because the party tom toms have been sounded.

The announcement of the new scale of pensions has been well received. The increase in pensions for disabled men is regarded as particularly satisfactory in every way. Under the old scale a totally disabled man with a wife and two children received $488 plus $144 for his children, or $632. Now he gets $600 plus $96 for his wife and $192 for his children, or $888 in all. If he has not a wife, but has two children, he formerly received $624, and now $792.

Although the newspapers have been forbidden by the censor to comment on the finding of the exemption tribunals, we are going to risk the wrath of Major Chambers long enough to draw the attention of those who are finding fault with some of the decisions of Messrs. Gillies and Izzard (the local tribunal), to a few things. These men are in a very unenviable position. They are there by the order of the government, and are sworn to do their duty to their country without fear or favor. The Military Service Act is law and the tribunals are part of the machinery for enforcing it. Failure to do their duty would result—as in the case of some other tribunals not far from here—in their being summoned before the judge and reprimanded. Mr. Gillies has three sons at the front, and besides is a very capable and well informed gentleman. While Mr. Izzard has no sons to send, as Warden of the county, he has shown himself to be not only patriotic in sentiment, but in real work, in his official capacity and as a private citizen.

Canada is at war. 400,000 of our brave boys have gone voluntarily to fight our battles. We promised to support them to the last man and the last dollar. Many of them will never come back. The soil of France and Belgium is hallowed by their graves :

"In Flanders fields the poppies blow,
Between the crosses, row on row
That mark our place, and in the sky
The larks still bravely singing, fly,
Scarce heard amid the guns below,
We are the dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie,
In Flanders fields.
Take up our quarrel with the foe;
To you from failing hands we throw
The torch; be sure to hold it high.
If you break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep though poppies grow,
In Flanders fields

Can we break faith ? Tariffs, railway steals, big interests, the high-cost of living, are all serious questions, but they can wait. The one big, burning, vital question, is the support of the boys who are keeping back the foe "in Flanders fields." Let us not forget this when we are trying to decide which way to vote on December 17th.

Let the Higher-Ups Do Their Duty

One of the things Canadians would like to see is a tightening up in connection with the management of Canada's part in this war. In many departments of the service there is a looseness. Many men have been taken out of productive occupations and put into the King's uniform, only to spend a year and sometimes two years, doing very little.

These things are being noticed by many people who are working hard, believing that all their energy is needed in producing the sinews of war. This was made plain the other day before the Port Elgin Exemption Board, when a mother who has had to go out in the fields and pitch hay and farm as the women of France and England are doing, pleaded to the board that there were "thousands of men in the army doing nothing, and yet her son, who was needed at home would be forced into the army where he would not be used perhaps for two years in any work worth while".

These words from a mother who knows what hard work is, and who knows that there is a great waste of men and time in the army, are worth thinking over. The young men taken by the first draft should be allowed to remain in their regular lines of work until it is absolutely necessary that they should go. Some of the finest soldiers in this war are the men who were made ready in less than three months for overseas. A great deal of the objection to the Military Service Act raised by the fathers and mothers is caused through the inability of the authorities to make good use of the men after they have been called to the colours. The men higher up are responsible. The people have a right to demand service from them.

There is a great deal of selfishness mixed with the patriotism of some people. They are quite willing that the Germans be beaten, providing someone else furnishes the men and the money.

Why The Tribunals, Anyway ?

In view of the pronouncement of Premier Borden and the Minister of Militia, that farmers' sons actually producing food stuffs will be sent back home, even if taken by the Tribunals, what is the use of Tribunals?

The young men whose claims have been disallowed, will have a new deal, according to the announcement, while the question arises in the minds of the Tribunals "What is the further use of taking men"?

Of course the village and town men may be drafted and sent to war, but is that quite fair?

The Slacker's 23rd Psalm

My friend in khaki is my shepherd, I shall not want.

He maketh me to lie down in my cosy cottage. He spareth me the evils of the fight.

He gladdeneth my heart. He maketh it possible for me to walk in the paths of cowardice, for my own life's sake.

Yea, though the shadows of destruction, fear and death hang over my cowering head, I will fear no evil, for is not my brother fighting for me; his weapons and his courage, they comfort me.

He enableth me to prepare a plentiful table, while he keepeth my enemies far from me; luxury and pleasure attend my way; the cup of life never tasted so sweet.

Surely safety and happiness shall follow me as long as my friend is unfailing; and I will dwell not in the trenches, but in my own house, undisturbed, as long as my brother does his duty.

A travelling salesman found himself in a village hotel dining room when a heavy downpour of rain set in. Addressing the waitress, he remarked: "It looks like the flood.

"Like what ?" the girl inquired.

"Like the Flood. You have read of the Flood and how the ark landed on Mount Ararat, haven't you? "

"No, sir. . I haven't seen a newspaper for three days," confessed the waitress.

BURGOYNE AND DISTRICT

Farmers were very busy during the fine weather of last week getting ready for a bumper crop next year, but a damper has been cast on their ardour by the unbelievable news that farmers' sons were being conscripted wholesale and in many cases the only efficient workman on the farm taken. Of course farmers are out in protest. If the already diminished help is to be further depleted, they may as well give up the battle, raise enough for their own bread and butter, and let everyone else go hang. If the Borden manifesto stating emphatically that abundance of provision was as necessary to the winning of the war as more men, and that men engaged in agriculture would not be called to serve in the army was another, "scrap of paper", then the country that would keep such a shifty government in power is simply courting starvation and ruin. We see a man coming, a real man, a chieftain, "Canada first" written on his heart and in his whole life, his face set like a flint, unaffected by Imperial tapestry, or steam roller, Canada ruled by the voice of the people, is ever his motto. He is not afraid to trust the people and the confidence is mutual. shame on those Liberals who a few months ago were pelting the Borden government with all manner of dirt, and condemning certain acts of the old "Rump" so called to political perdition, but are now found eating from the same plate with those they had condemned and as they swallow the dainty bits they hold up their faces to their amazed former comrades, and say come and share the spoils with these splendid patriotic men and win the war.

Mr. George Grieve has been suffering much for several days from neuralgia in one side, the pain very severe at intervals.

The funeral of the late Mrs Miller took place on Friday to Port Elgin cemetery.

Winter has shown 20 degrees of frost already and stock have had to be gathered into winter quarters from the snow covered fields.

Master Archie McCannel was the finder of a well filled purse the other day outside Mr. Ferguson's store, although no advertising was done about it the owner turned up the following day in person of Mr. Kerr, he having dropped it while leaving the store the previous evening.

A very large gathering of former acquaintances and friends from the surrounding country attended the memorial services Sunday morning. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers and national flags, one large Union Jack enshrouded the Roll of Honor which was set up close to the pulpit. The excellent sermon preached by the Rev. C. C. Strachan was from latest words of the apostle Paul "I have fought a good fight" etc Mr. James Scott from Dunblane sang with good effect an appropriate solo after the sermon. O 'Canada' was sung by the choir and a verse of the National Anthem was sung after the last hymn. This is the second service of the same kind held here within a short time."

McLAREN'S HARDWARE

NOTES BY THE WAY

It is not quite fair for Northcliffe's influential Daily Mail to campaign for the promotion of the marriage of English women and Canadian soldiers. Respect is due to the parents here who wish their boys happily to return to continue their education or professional training. Respect is also due to cherished ambitions for family alliances. Above all, perhaps, respect is due to the natural right of Canadian women to marry Canadian men, their schoolmates and neighbors. The war has already thinned the ranks of an army of young men of 380,000, which in due course is to be raised to 450,000 and probably more. The unmarried woman will be poorly compensated by profitable employment in the places formerly occupied by men.—Weekly Sun.

We hear considerable argument against The Military Service Act, especially among the agricultural sections. There is a feeling that the farm is being unnecessarily depleted. In this district very few men have been taken from the farms, and it is certainly a very hard matter for those of us who are not conversant with the full details of this situation at the front to decide what is necessary. But we do know that in Great Britain there is scarcely a man of military age left on the land, and yet in face of this, each county has been organized by the government looking towards the increase of its crops by 30 per cent next year. We have read the reports of a good many Old Country Tribunals and have wondered how the end is going to be worked. But with tractors, men above military age and women, they seem to be doing wonders.

The Kansas City Times has an article telling how some "conscientious objectors" act when in the army camp. There are thirteen objectors at Camp Funston, Kansas, and so far they have refused to do any work of any kind in camp or wear any clothing except that which they wore when they came here, were given a cleaning up to-day on orders from the medical department. None of the men had bathed or changed their clothing since coming here and the medical officers recommended they be scrubbed, a change of clothing given them and their hair and whiskers trimmed to the regulation military style for sanitary reasons. There are eleven Huttish Brethren from South Dakota in the number, one Bible school student and one Mennonite. The objectors had refused to remove their clothing, or bathe themselves, and did nothing but cry and pray. Their only statement was, "It's against our religion." The soldiers had to undress them, bathe them, and then put the clean clothing on them. They were given fatigue clothing—overalls—to wear while their apparel is being fumigated and washed.

Finances in Healthy Condition

The financial statement of the Dominion for the first half of the fiscal year, which ended September 30, is regarded by the Minister of Finance as most satisfactory. Receipts from all sources show an increase of $34,000,000 over the corresponding period of last year. Payments on capital and ordinary account, including the increased interests, and pension charges are $1,800,000 less than for the first six months of last year. The net result, apart from war expenditures, shows an improvement in the financial position of $35,000,000 as against the first half of the year 1916-17. During the six months in question the surplus revenue over capital and ordinary expenditure amounted to $65,000,000, which was applied to payment of the principal of war expenditure in Canada.

The Simcoe Reformer on the Situation

When the Canadian people go to the polls on December 17th the one overshadowing subject that will be present with them, as they mark their ballots, will be the continuance of the country in the war. This war-time election is not going to be decided on the price per acre of Camp Borden, the soundness of Foster's horses, the extravagance of Sam Hughes' trips to Europe, or the high price of munitions two years ago. All of these are of the dead past. A long list of sins on the part of the old Borden-Rogers "regime may easily be written up. But they were the sins of an administration that is dead. Today an appeal is being made to the people by a new Government—a Borden-Carvell Cabinet. It is an administration with no past and a possibly great future. No sounder Liberal walks than Frank Carvell. The Reformer has no fear in intrusting its party concerns to his leadership. General Mewburn describes himself as the son of man who was a Radical when a Radical was pointed at. He himself is as square a man as can be found anywhere, and although never a politician, has always been a convinced Liberal. Of Mr. Rowell's earnestness towards the prosecution of the war, and his burning desire to get a fairer deal for the poorer man there can be no manner of doubt. Every Liberal who sat in the late House of Commons from west of the Great Lakes, with the exception of Frank Oliver, is today supporting Union. In the Martime Province there is no trouble. Pugsley has accepted high office from the Government. Fielding, all through the life of the Laurier administration its Finance Minister, is supporting Union, and will probably be one of its candidates. Even so doughty a champion of Sir Wilfred as Ed. MacDonald is now counted as an administration candidate. In Ontario George Graham, Fred Pardee, E. W. Nesbitt, W. A. Charlton, and W. M. German will be Government candidates where they run. Can it be possible that all these men are wrong—that they have for some sordid reason merely turned traitors to their former principles? Is it not more likely that they, possessing information not open to the general public as to the seriousness of the war's situation, are sacrificing their sympathies to their judgment and conscience?—Simcoe Reformer.

If you have a thing to sell let The Times tell the people about it.

GIRLS! WHITEN YOUR SKIN WITH LEMON JUICE

Make a beauty lotion for a few cents to remove tan, freckles, sallowness.

Your grocer has the lemons and any drug store or toilet counter will supply you with three ounces of orchard white for a few cents. Squeeze the juice of two fresh lemons into a bottle, then put in the orchard white and shake well. This makes a quarter pint of the very best lemon skin whitener and complexion beautifier known. Massage this fragrant, creamy lotion daily into the face, neck, arms and hands and just see how freckles, tan, sallowness, redness and roughness disappear and how smooth, soft and clear the skin becomes. Yes! It is harmless, and the beautiful results will surprise you.

The Toronto Daily Star

They like it, because it is a real up-to-the-minute newspaper.

And they like it even more, because it helps them to make money, by giving them the market quotations while prices are still "hot."

You get the live stock, grain, and produce market reports from Toronto, Montreal, Buffalo, Chicago, and Winnipeg from twelve hours to one full day ahead of your receiving the same quotations in the next morning's papers.

And you know how often you have said to yourself, "If I had known earlier just how the market was going, I could have made money."

In addition to its splendid market service, the Toronto "Daily Star" gives you the most comprehensive war and general news service obtainable through any daily paper in Canada.

Then, too, there are pages to interest the women and the children, and a good comic cartoon series.

In fact the Toronto "Daily Star" is just such a newspaper as a farmer who is interested in the world news likes to read, and he eventually comes to regard it as the inseparable companion of his leisure hours.

From a Soldier to His Mother

Are they praying for us at home,
Are they meeting together in prayer,
Or going on in the same old way,
As they did when I was there?

We thank them for their letters,
We thank them for all their care;
But oh, just tell them, dear mother,
We are needing so much more prayer.

Will you ask them to gather together,
To meet at our Father's throne,
That we may be kept from falt'ring
When we feel we are standing alone?

There are moments when courage fails us;
When dangers around us stare;
Oh, tell them again, dear mother,
We are needing so much more prayer.

He has twenty-nine chances of coming home to one chance of being killed.

He has ninety-eight chances of recovering from a wound to two chances of dying.

He has only one chance in 500 of losing a limb.

He will live five years longer because of physical training.

He is freer from disease in the army than in civil life.

He has better medical care at the front than at home.

In other wars from ten to fifteen men died from disease to one from bullets.

In this war one man dies from disease to every ten from bullets.

LIFT YOUR CORNS — OFF WITH FINGERS

Tells how to loosen a tender corn or callus so it lifts out without pain.

You reckless men and women who are pestered with corns and who have at least once a week invited an awful death from lockjaw or blood poison are now told by a Cincinnati authority to use a drug called freezone, which the moment a few drops are applied to any corn or callus the soreness is relieved and soon the entire corn or callus, root and all, lifts off with the fingers.

Freezone dries the moment it is applied, and simply shrivels the corn or callus without inflaming or even irritating the surrounding tissue or skin. A small bottle of freezone will cost very little at any of the drug stores, but will positively rid one's feet of every hard or soft corn or hardened callus. If your druggist hasn't any freezone he can get it at any wholesale drug house for you.

"Camouflage" is a new word, or an old one brought to life by the war. Pronounced "camooflarge" (but omitting the d sound in the g) by those who speak Parisian French. It means "illusion". In the present war the Parisian scene painter has supplied the allies with miles and miles of painted canvas to camouflage the Huns. It may be an embankment, it may be a roadside—anything to deceive and make him or his flyers believe he is up against the real thing. The guns are camouflaged with brush, trees, vines to illusion.

Beri-Beri On a Windjammer

"I lost my Chinese cook this voyage," remarked Capt. John Anderson, of the British four masted bark Daylight, which recently completed a smart passage of ninety-eight days from Calcutta to New York. "Not that old Ching Lee was lost overboard or had beri-beri, but when we got to Calcutta he said he just had to go home to see his wife, back Canton River way.

"Pretty nice sentiment, what? Chinaman going 2,000 miles to see his wife. Anyway, he said he would rejoin the ship when we got up to Shanghai. That's something to look forward to.

"I have lost a Chinese cook under more strenuous circumstances, when you had to sew him up in canvas and let him go over the side. I remember one voyage—we were bound from Bombay for Baltimore—when the ship was swept with an epidemic of beri-beri, and two-thirds of the hands, including the mate, were put out of commission.

"But the Chinese cook was the first one to go. One day I passed him out walking along the deck between the after cabin and the galley. He was limping, I noticed, and his feet were swollen. 'Lege full water, go die soon,' he said.

"I ordered him into his bunk and began dosing him up as well as I could. I had two medical books on board and read up on beri-beri. It was all very well to read up, but I found that the books contained almost opposite views as to the medicine to be given in the case of this peculiar disease. So the books were not much help, and the poor old cook died. He might have done better if he had taken any of the medicine I prescribed; but we found all that carefully hidden under the mattress of his bunk.

"The men fell ill rapidly after this. The mate toppled over on the poop one day as I was taking the sun. In a few days out of thirty-two men on board only ten were fit for duty. I had only five men in a watch on deck at one time unless we had to take in sail. The weather was good, too good, in fact, most of the time, hot and sultry in the Indian Ocean, which did not seem to help my sick men.

"Beri-beri seems to be a mysterious disease and to baffle the doctors. This was evidenced by the two contradictory medical books I had. Well, we buried three more men in the lonely Indian Ocean, and we let the mate go in the long swells off the Cape. I was almost determined to put in at the Cape for medical assistance, but we were far south, and I decided to keep on for my destination.

"It was trying work to navigate the ship and keep an eye on fifteen or twenty sick men, to say nothing of the working members of the crew, who began to kick, as sailors will, and call her a hoodoo ship and a death ship. I began to think there was a Jonah aboard. However, things got better in the Atlantic. The southeast trades were strong and we were only nineteen days to the line, without starting a rope-yarn.

"There seemed to be little I could do for these poor chaps suffering in their bunks. I tried the cures suggested by one book and then those indicated by the other. Neither seemed to have any appreciable effect, and I began to doubt that the medicos knew what they were talking about.

"We lost only one more man in the Atlantic, making six dead altogether. But even with conditions getting better we were very short-handed and it was weary work. When we got up to Hatteras I could muster only eight fit men on deck at one time, and it was just our luck to butt into a nor'wester. With only a few hands I could handle the ship but poorly and we were blown off a hundred miles or so.

"It took us ten painful days to work her back, and when we got a towboat off Cape Henry we had been 138 days on the passage, the longest voyage this vessel ever made. On reaching Baltimore I sent twelve men to the hospital and felt somewhat like going there myself.

"Strangely enough, as soon as beri-beri victims get ashore they improve rapidly. My fellows in the hospital were soon ready to hobble out, but were kept at the hospital for some time so that specialists could make blood tests.

"I hope the scientists gained something from their experiments on the Daylight victims, but I have not heard as yet of any positive cure being found. At any rate I don't want another voyage with my crew down with beri-beri. That was about the most trying trip ever I had."—New York Sun.

Liszt Fooled Them.

Wrapped in his dressing gown and with feet encased in slippers, Franz Liszt was sitting comfortably one evening in his armchair ready for work and inviting inspiration. On the floor above in the apartments of a banker a noisy musical soiree was in progress. Polonaises had succeeded waltzes and nocturnes had followed polonaises, when suddenly the door of the salon opened and Liszt entered still wrapped in his dressing gown. The astonishment of the company may be imagined. With slow steps Liszt walked toward the piano, and the young key pounder who was sitting at it quickly left his place. Liszt sat down at the instrument, carelessly swept his fingers over the keys as if to prelude, and then suddenly he shut down the cover and put the key in his pocket. And immediately, with the same tranquil air with which he had entered, he went out and returned to his room, where he could work at his ease.

Arms of Washington.

The arms which Washington used are heraldically described as follows: Argent (silver), two bars gules (red), in chief three mullets (stars) of the second, gules (red). The crest: A raven with wings addorsed, sable (black), issuing out of a ducal coronet, or (gold).

Although these arms were used by Washington, the arms of the family in Yorkshire are materially different, bearing a lion, and being surmounted by a crest with an eagle, not a raven. The Yorkshire arms were the original arms, according to Albert Welles, whose "Pedigree and History of the Washington Family" gives with edifying detail the descent of the Father of His Country from Odin, first king of Scandinavia. Fifty-five generations were required to evolve George Washington from Odin.

How the Horsefly Bites.

When the horsefly alights on a horse he walks around looking for a tender spot, and this he finds with his hairy feelers. Then he cuts a hole with the scissors on each side of his central tubular tongue.

An ordinary lead pencil cannot be sharpened to a point without sharpening the lead. So it is with the tubular end of this tongue-like extension of the horsefly, says the Popular Science Monthly. Nature has provided it with barbed piercing "derrick ropes." The fly inserts these sharp points into the horse and then pulls back on them. The barbs hold, and the fly's tongue is forced down into the horse's flesh. But if the hole has already been made then it is not necessary for these elaborate tools to be taken from the sheath in which they are placed within the tongue or proboscis. The blood is sucked up by the tongue in practically the same way as by other forms of flies.

Our Railway Men in War

Few people realize the vital importance which railways have come to play in the operations of the armies in Europe. In the early days of the war the Allies on all fronts were in their respect under a tremendous handicap as compared to the long-preparing and thoroughly prepared Germanic Allies. Strategic railways radiated in all directions from Berlin like a great cobweb.

Now three narrow-gauge trains at the front transport as much as a hundred motor lorries. In addition in bad weather the lorries will knock a road to pieces, and frequently traffic becomes impossible. With the steel ribbons repairs are readily effected, and weather conditions have comparatively small effect.

Railways of all kinds, light railways and heavy railways, have displaced motor lorries, and have even entered into competition with the Front Area Horse Transport.

The ability of a modern army to fight is measured by materials with which it is supplied. This war has been called a war of material, and the transporting of that material is vital.

Training in building railways of the highest speed in Canada has naturally resulted in fitting Canadians pre-eminently for this work, and without undue egotism it is safe to say that the Railway Bridges and Corps from the great Dominion, through their ability to lay railroads in great haste, have placed an important part in achieving the great successes which have fallen to our Armies in the Western Front this year.

The Canadian Railway Troops were organized and rapidly increased in number in November, 1916. (The Canadian Railway Construction Corps is not included in the Canadian Railway Troops.)

Though working under continuous shell fire, these were building light railways at the rate of approximately one hundred miles over shell devasted ground per month. It is impossible to imagine the pitted state of the ground, and the difficulties must be seen to be understood. A battalion played a part in the battle of Messines. Every preparation was made by the battalion in anticipation of the battle starting on 7 June. On the night of the 6th the battalion surveyors slept in the front line trenches and the first line went over the top; the battalion survey party was surveying the line to the village which was expected to be captured. The survey of the line was completed on the night of the 7th, and very soon the line was constructed and trains running over it. Two weeks later the battalion constructed numerous additional lines in a very bad country.

Throughout the heavy bombardment which preceded our advance, the battalion had charge of the maintenance of all the lines in the forward area, and notwithstanding damage by enemy shell fire repairs were effected so quickly that not a single car load of ammunition was delayed, and many hundreds of tons of ammunition per day were carried to the guns over lines built by and maintained by the battalion.

The work of all the battalions under the Canadian Railway Corps is done under equally trying conditions and occasionally even more difficult circumstances arise. The Huns by means of aerial observation see the advancing railway and throw over plenty of shells to batter up the line and hamper its construction. Casualties are, of course, unavoidable. American locomotives are chiefly used to pull a type of truck made in England. Thousands of tons of shells are thus hauled to feed our guns. No complaints are now heard of a shortage of shells. It is not therefore surprising that the artillery welcome the new form of transportation.

Canadian Railway troops are playing an important part in the great scheme of the big advance. This is another sphere where Canada and her sons are doing their bit in the effort for the early realization of a lasting peace.—Sheffield, Eng., Weekly Independent

SOISSONS.

Soissons, one of the many unfortunate cities of Northern France, around which the varying fortunes of the French and German armies have eddied and flowed since the first days of the war, is again in the zone of bombardment. The National Geographic Society of Washington issued the following war geography bulletin on this city between which and Rheims the French have recently scored a notable victory, advancing along a front of nearly 25 miles:

"Although it remained untouched when the Germans made their first sweep through Northern France, advancing to the Marne, Soissons was sorely buffeted in the bombardment which accompanied the battle of the Aisne, and was further damaged during the week's Battle of Soissons at the end of which the French were forced to retire across the Aisne at a point to the east of the city, in January, 1915.

"Bombardments, sieges and pillagings are part and parcel of Soissons' history. Indeed, few cities in Europe possessing as little strategic significance as this place have suffered as greatly in war. In early Roman days the place was known as Nowiodunum, chief town of the Suessones. Here the last of the Roman governors of Gaul, Syagrius, was defeated toward the close of the fifth century by Clovis, the Frank. And in this city, which witnessed his triumph over the foreign foe, Clovis was wedded to Clotilda, she about whom so many romantic legends have been woven and who finally prevailed upon her husband to renounce paganism and embrace Christianity. Long before this notable event, however, Soissons had become an important place in the chronicles of the Christian faith, for it was here in 297 that the famous shoemaker nobles, the brothers Crispin and Crispinian, suffered martyrdom.

"Among the many stories told of the trials and triumphs of these two apostles is one which relates that the Roman prefect Rictiovarus commanded that they be cast into a cauldron of boiling tar. The brothers emerged unscathed and refreshed from the bath, much after the manner of their Jewish forerunners, Shadrach, Mesheck and Abednego, from the fiery furnace in Babylon. Rictiovarus, upon witnessing this miracle, cast himself into the caldron and was consumed. But the martyrs were subsequently beheaded and their remains rested for a time in the city of their execution.

"Across the Aisne from Soissons is the suburb of St. Medard, famous for its celebrated abbey, which was one of the wealthiest and most influential in all France during the Middle Ages. It was in this institution that the Roman Emperor Louis the Pius was held a prisoner by his two own sons in the ninth century, and here also Abelard, the great teacher, was confined for a time after the tragic denouement of the Heloise romance.

"Soissons was the rallying point for Napoleon's shattered army after the battle of Waterloo. During the war of 1870 the town capitulated to the Germans after a three days' bombardment. Only a few years ago a monument was erected in a public square of the city to the memory of those citizens whom the Teuton invaders shot.

"At the time of the outbreak of the world war Soissons had a population of 15,000. Its chief industries were iron and copper foundries, boiler factories, and the manufacture of agricultural implements, straw hats and glass. Its grain market was important and it was famous for its haricot beans."

Shot the Fish.

Instead of using nets or the conventional hook and line, the natives of Guiana shoot the fish with bow and arrows, says the Popular Science Monthly. The arrow used is designed especially for this purpose and is about five feet in length, with no feathers. The head, which is barbed, is made from sheet iron and is provided with a socket which is slipped over the head of the shaft and with a light, strong line about ten feet long.

SOLDIERS ON THE MARCH.

Distances That Trained, Hardened Men Can Cover in a Day

The Army Drill Book says that trained and hardened infantry can cover from twenty to twenty-five miles a day when in small bodies. As the size of the command increases the distance covered becomes less, as the rate is lowered and time is needed to get all the units into and out of camp.

With a regiment or less of average troops—regulars—marching over average roads, the rate should be from two and three-quarters to three miles an hour, while a division cannot be expected to accomplish more than twelve and a half miles a day.

Of course, all these figures will vary with different conditions or roads and weather. Untrained troops could not approach them until hardened. Though they might do better for a day or two, they could not keep up the steady pace of the seasoned regulars for a long distance.

Marching with full equipment is hard physical work, and, like every other form of labor, requires a proper period of training. The seasoned force will keep up a steady pace, with ten minute halts every hour, a fifteen minute stop being made at the end of the first half or three-quarters of an hour. Green troops are apt to straggle badly.—Outing Magazine.

Holland and Flowers.

It was only after the fall of Constantinople in 1453 that Holland became such a gay land of flowers as it now is. Many Dutchmen went to the east during the years of the great crusades, and those of them who loved beautiful things brought many home again with them. Not only did they carry away with them silks and embroideries, jewels, spices and fruits, but in the bottom of their ships they brought seeds. When these seeds were planted in the rich soil of Holland such wondrous flowers appeared as had never before been seen in that northern country. The people became wildly enthusiastic over the new colors and scents and foliage brought to them from the east, and in Holland there sprang up a great love for gardening.

Waking the Sleepers.

In a dairy kept in 1645 it is asserted that "Allen Brydges has been chose to wake the sleepers in meeting, and, being much proud of his place, must needs have a fox taile fixed to the end of a long staffe, wherewith he may brush the faces of them that have naps in time of discourse." This energetic individual was likewise armed with "a sharpe thorne" for the benefit of those who "be most sounde." There is a record of the use of this implement upon Mr. Tompkins, who was sleeping comfortably in the corner of his pew when Allen "thrust the staff behind Dame Ballard to give him a grievous prick upon the hand, whereupon Mr. Tompkins did spring much above the floor and with terrible force did strike his head against the wall and also to the great wonder of all, 'prophanallie' exclaim in a loud voice, 'Curse the woodchuck!' he dreaming, as it seemed, that a woodchuck had seized him and bit his hand."

"He who steals my purse steals trash," quoted the Practical Politician grandiloquently, "but he who takes away my good name"—"Accomplishes the impossible," interrupted the Reformer.

Abandon Food Prejudices.

Don't be finicky. Be willing to try new foods. Certain plentiful and nourishing foods widely used and enjoyed in one section are practically unknown in other sections of the country. Learn to know all the good things, not a few only.

People too easily get into food ruts; insist on eating only the food they are used to and refuse to give a fair trial to others. This causes undue demand for certain staples, with resulting scarcity or high prices when crops are short. At the same time other valuable foods may be relatively cheap and available. A striking instance of this is failure fully to appreciate rice—a valuable source of starch—when potatoes are scarce and high. Another example is refusal in certain sections to use anything but wheat as a bread stuff, when corn—a valuable cereal widely used elsewhere as a breadstuff—is plentiful and relatively cheap.—Los Angeles Times.

In this war one man dies from disease to every ten from bullets.

This war is less wasteful of life than any other in history.

Only 10 per cent. of all Canadians disabled for further service has been physically unable to engage in their former occupations.

If your boy is one of the 10 per cent. the government will re-educate him in another vocation at which he can earn a living.

How Hard Rubber is Made.

We're all of us coming into contact with hard rubber every day of our lives. Our fountain pen, our inkwell tops, the magneto parts and telephone receivers are all made of hard rubber.

But how is it made? Where does it differ from the rubber in an automobile tire, for instance? We'll wager a guess that not one man in a thousand knows.

Vulcanization consists in uniting sulphur with rubber to give it certain properties of elasticity, durability and, still more important, make it to retain these same properties under all normal conditions of heat and cold.

When a larger proportion of sulphur than is found in ordinary soft rubber is present and vulcanization is continued for a much longer time we obtain as a result a substance vastly different in physical properties—hard rubber. Before vulcanization it is quite elastic and we can mould it to suit our needs.—Exchange.

BIGGEST DRIVE IN TRENCH WAR ON WEST FRONT

Expert's Opinion On the Terrific British Smash Toward Cambrai.

RELIEVE ITALY

And May Mean a Great Victory Over the Hun.

(By Frank H. Simonds, Associate Editor New York Tribune.

New York Report —A little more than two years ago, when the allied attacks in Champagne and Artois ushered in the new style of offensive on the western front, the world at once applied a single test to determine success or failure. Despite brilliant local successes by the French and some progress by the British, the final judgment was that the offensive of September 25, 1915, was a failure because the German lines were not pierced. A few months later, when the Germans made their great attack upon Verdun, the same test awarded the victory to the defenders, even before they won back the lost positions on the heights above the Meuse.

In the great Battle of the Somme the world still for a long period of time accepted the same test. The British, with their French allies, did not immediately pierce or break through the German front. On the one hand, as the Battle of the Somme went forward and allied progress was considerable and German losses unmistakably great, it began to be conceived that an offensive which did not break the line had value in wearing down the resistance of the Germans. Further than this the German retreat in the spring disclosed the fact that if a local gain be sufficient, a dislocation of considerable extent of the front may follow it.

For the last three months we have been seeing in Flanders a struggle outwardly resembling the Battle of the Somme, yet revealing on close examination marked differences. On the Somme the Germans endeavored to defend a fixed line of elaborate entrenchment. The British artillery demonstrated during the course of the battle that not only could the elaborate defences be destroyed, but the losses of the defender might be very much greater than that of the assailant since his troops could be caught before they could get out of their dugouts. The Battle of the Somme, therefore, effectively destroyed the first German method of defence on the western front.

SO-CALLED ELASTIC DEFENCE.

Hindenburg then had recourse to the so-called "Elastic defence," which consisted in holding a deep front with few troops scattered in shell craters in small concrete works ("pillboxes") and covered by an enormous extent of barbed-wire entanglement. Such a system of defence could not be easily abolished by barrage fire of heavy explosives, and while an attack was still struggling through this area the Germans were able to prepare a counter-attack. Through [illegible] part of the present Flanders campaign the British struggled, not wholly successfully, with this new system of defence. But in recent weeks the British have evidently evolved a new method of attack, and we have seen them surmounting the Passchendaele Ridge and pushing forward steadily toward Roulers. Now, when we come to the new operations before Cambrai, it is apparent that the British have suddenly applied on a sector, long quiet, all the lessons they have learned in Flanders, and that they have been able to bring off a very successful surprise attack.

The first question to be asked is whether the operation which we are now seeing is a major effort to pierce the German lines and achieve a dislocation, such as the Germans themselves have recently brought off in Northern Italy, and compel a wide retirement in Northern France. So far as one can judge this is not the case with the present "show" about Cambrai. It does not seem to be one of those great efforts like the Somme and the summer campaign in Flanders. It seems rather to be the case of an achievement by a single army only slightly reinforced.

There remains the second possibility. Is it an effort to seize territory of immediate value comparable with the Vimy Ridge, with Hill No. 70, with the Passchendaele Ridge, about [illegible] so far as one can judge this [illegible] the case. We have had little information about the Arras-St. Quentin sector of the British front. We know very little about the "line" to which the Germans retreated last spring. But there has been no suggestion that between the Scarpe and the Somme there are any such natural military obstacles as Vimy Ridge, or that ridge which carried the Chemin-des-Dames north of the Aisne. Nor can one see that any local gains here would gravely threaten the German position in France, as this position would be threatened, for example, could the French take the heights south of Laon or the hills north of Rheims.

There is a third possibility. The Italian campaign has become one of such great importance that any assistance which the allies could give in the way of drawing off German troops which might otherwise be sent to the Venetian front would have a real value for the Italians. The attack in Champagne in 1915 was not designed with the hope of piercing the German lines, but was in point of fact primarily launched with the purpose of compelling the Germans to recall troops from Russia and prevent a complete Russian disaster. And in this it was successful.

ITS PRIMAR YOBJECT.

So far, then, as one can now judge, the present attack between the Scarpe and the Somme is primarily designed to take off pressure upon Italy by compelling Germany to recall troops and guns either sent or marked for sending to Italy. It is the natural and logical military step. It will then be successful even if little ground is gained, provided it recalls troops from Italy or lessens the pressure upon the Piave line.

Now it is quite clear from the first information we have had that this attack before Cambrai has resulted in the largest gain of ground—that is, in the most considerable forward push—in the whole period of trench warfare. When the British speak of an advance to a depth of over five miles on a wide front they give a measure which has not been surpassed on the western front, and has not even been attained, although something approximating this was achieved in the great push out from Arras along the Scarpe on Easter Monday of this year. Now, it is much too early to attempt to measure the probable extent of the British advance. It may be that they will successfully push forward and compel a general retirement, but such information as we have, so far, indicates that while considerable ground has been gained on the thirty-mile front from the Scarpe to the Somme the largest gains have been made on a relatively restricted sector not over six or eight miles in width, just south of Cambrai. Unless this wedge can be widened it is unlikely that there will be any real piercing of all the German defensive positions, and the chances of widening this break must be steadily reduced as the Germans are able to bring up reserves and new artillery about the threatened point.

In sum, then, the victory which the British have won between the Somme and the Scarpe—which will probably draw its name from Cambrai, the nearest town of importance—represents as it now stands the largest forward push achieved in any offensive since trench warfare began. It represents the most successful surprise attack that we have any record of. It will be one of the great tactical successes of the war if it compels the Germans to lessen pressure upon the Italians, but its first phase does not permit us to believe that it will lead immediately to a German retirement behind the Meuse and to the French frontier. The test of the magnitude of the British success in this battle must come in the next few hours, when we shall see whether they will be able to widen the breach they have made, or whether, as in the case of the battle of Arras, their advance will be checked before some support or "switch" line. Perhaps the most interesting detail that we have yet learned about the attack is the assertion that it came without artillery preparation, and as a complete surprise to the Germans. Hitherto no attack of considerable proportions on the western front has been launched without considerable artillery preparation, not excepting the German attack, which opened the second battle of Ypres and preceded the emission of gas. There is at least a suggestion that the surprise is in part due to a weakening of German morale. If any such failure had occurred on the allied side we should not be hearing about the success of German propaganda. Conceivably the Germans on their side are beginning to succumb to outside suggestion, but there is every reason to believe that on the west front bombs and high explosives are still more useful than printed matter.

MAXIMUM OF POSSIBILITY.

That the French have begun an attack on their side of the Rheims-St. Gobain-Cambrai salient—that is, the portion of the German line projecting most deeply into France, at the very least suggests that the two western allies may be making a combined operation to break in this salient and compel a general German retreat between Verdun and Lille. This would mean the evacuation of practically all of northern France. This is the maximum of possibility. By contrast, the French operation may be nothing more than a local offensive designed to prevent the withdrawal of German troops from the French front to reinforce the shaken German ones on the British front. Nothing that has yet happened precludes the possibility that the whole operation is primarily designed to relieve the pressure on the Italian front. But the character of the two attacks made in France warrants the conclusion that a serious breach may be made in the German position and a great allied victory may result. All depends on whether both the French and the British can make wide breaches in the German defensive lines, and it is too soon to say whether this is possible.

TORONTO MURDER.

Italian Killed by Compatriot Over Theft.

Toronto Report—Frank Malatto, an Italian, living at 58 Adelaide street west, was shot through the heart and instantly killed shortly after noon [illegible] by a fellow-countryman known as Charlie Ella. "After [illegible] Malatto, Ella [illegible] the revolver [illegible] Bartolo, a nephew of the dead man, and fired two shots at him. One bullet went wild and the second struck him in the heart. Before Ella could [illegible] made his escape.

The shooting occurred in a railway paint shop at the foot of Spadina Avenue, and was the sequel to the robbing of Malatto's trunk and the theft therefrom of two revolvers. As one of the stolen weapons was an automatic [illegible], the police [illegible] the opinion that Malatto was killed by his own revolver. After the murder Ella dashed from the paint shop and effected an escape. During the day [illegible] the city for him, but up to the present [illegible] efforts have been futile.

TO SETTLE POLISH PROBLEM.

Copenhagen Cable — The Polish problem, and the proposed annexation of the new kingdom to the Hapsburg monarchy, will be discussed at the meeting of the main committee of the Reichstag on Nov. 2[illegible], not by Government initiative, but at the demand of Reichstag leaders. The majority parties, it is announced, will express the expectation that the Government will adopt no decision without a preliminary discussion and agreement with the Reichstag.

RECENT BATTLE IN CATTEGAT PROVES WHO RULES THE SEAS

Fight Was Right On Germany's Doorstep, and Was a British Clean-Up—Foe's Big Fleet Got Calls for Aid, but Refused to Take a Chance.

Base of British Grand Fleet, Cable. —(Correspondence.)—The recent naval action in the Cattegat, where the British sank a German cruiser and ten armed patrol ships, is an example of the careful planning which lies behind every move on the naval chart. A comparatively insignificant force of British destroyers and light cruisers were the actual stage performers in the morning and the action was over three hours later. The German fleet behind its fortifications received the calls for help, but dared not take a chance—probably well knowing that any attempt to send out help would be confronted with enemies rising out of the sea from all directions.

A fog lay over the entire Cattegat throughout the action and the British destroyers picked off their victims one by one, and sank them. The German auxiliary cruiser, Marie, which was leading the fleet of patrol boats, was a ship of 2,000 tons. Her captain, Herr Lauterbach, was wounded, but reached the Danish shore safely. His ship, which had four guns and a crew of 90, was "suddenly attacked," he said in an interview with a Danish newspaperman afterwards, "by a fleet of British destroyers, and the shells fired by them descended with such rapidity that the men on the Marie were almost unable to use the guns. Only a few shots were fired before the ship was a mass of flames."

His unpopularity extended to his own men, and in the Cattegat battle the first remark made by a German bluejacket rescued from the sea was a fervently expressed hope that the British had not made the mistake of rescuing his captain. His report that he fired his guns as long as possible is denied by his own men who declare that Lauterbach was "seized with funk as soon as the enemy appeared," and that not a single shot was fired from the Marie's guns.

Presumably the Marie was making her way towards the trade route between Norway and Scotland, in hopes of repeating the German attack on the British convoy of Oct. 17. The British commander concentrated his fire first of all on the Marie and then detached his fastest vessels to round up the escorting patrol vessels. This was thoroughly done after a hunt lasting nearly three hours. This action, it should be remembered, occurred in waters which the Germans regarded as practically one of their "inland seas." The Cattegat is the gateway to the Baltic. The scene of the fight is 600 miles from the nearest British coast but less than 200 miles from Kiel. The Germans held their favorite "interior lines," while the British forces had to cross the North Sea, go up through the Skaggerak, and then around the Skaw. The Germans had every chance to execute a coup, cutting off the retreat of the British forces by bringing superior units up the coast to the entrance to Skaggerak. That they did not care to attempt this is evidence of their appreciation of the initiative and resource of the British navy.

An interesting comparison might be made between this clean victory by the British destroyers and the tip and run raid by the German light cruisers on a British convoy on Oct. 17th. The Germans sent out two of their fastest cruisers in the darkness, struck their blow in nervous haste in the early morning hours, not even pausing to rescue a single life of hundreds of combatants and non-combatants, then ran away northward, to spend the remaining hours of daylight in hiding, and when night fell dashed down the Norwegian coast, and thus returned home without being intercepted.

On the occasion of the British victory the fight occurred, not in the North Sea, but on Germany's doorstep; not at night, but in daylight; not hurriedly or nervously, for sixty-four prisoners were taken, drowning men rescued from the water, thus providing another vivid contrast between German and British methods of warfare. Moreover, the Germans ruthlessly and unnecessarily sacrificed scores of innocent neutrals.

The return of the British squadron to its base was quiet and unostentatious. By nightfall they were off again on their business of sweeping the sea.

The cruise of the fleet into the Cattegat and the little victory which the British navy won there, without the loss of a single British life, while not largely important in itself, is a concrete illustration and proof of the manner in which the Allied fleets control the seas, and enable the Allied Governments to use their resources in full strength on the various fronts.

RUSS REVULSION OF FEELING GROWS AGAINST THE BOLSHEVIK

Lenine Now a Virtual Dictator—360,000 Troops Recalled From Front.

Stockholm Cable says.— Reports brought by the latest travellers to reach Tornea from Petrograd indicate that a revulsion of feeling is setting in against the Bolsheviki. Regiments of soldiers have paraded the streets of the Russian capital, bearing banners with inscriptions such as "We want no separate peace." "Down with Petrograd's domination by a minority party tyranny," and "Nicholas' regime was never so tyrannic as the Bolsheviki regime."

The central committee of the anti-Bolsheviki Socialists coalition has passed a resolution demanding liberty of the press, the dismissal of the Red Guard, and the immediate cessation of fratricidal war. Maxim Gorky's paper and the Volna Narodna also demand that the Red Guard be disarmed.

American Minister Morris learns from a competent source that the food supply of Petrograd is ominously short and that the bread ration is now three-quarters of a Russian pound for two days.

Nearly one-third of the members of the executive committee formed by the Maximalists at the outbreak of the revolt have resigned, and it is reported that the remainder have conferred dictatorial law-making powers on Nikolai Lenine, who is now issuing decrees altering the fundamental laws.

360,000 TROOPS RECALLED.

Petrograd, Tuesday Cable — The military chief of the district of Kiev and the temporary governor, with their staffs, are reported to have left their posts. Ukrainian commissaries have been appointed to succeed them, and they have confirmed the independence of the Ukraine. Three hundred and sixty thousand Ukrainian troops are said to have been recalled from the front. This is considered upon here as meaning a serious crippling of the army, and the possible opening of the front to the enemy.

An armored train bound for Petrograd has been captured by detachments of sailors and returned to Moscow.

The Foreign Office in Petrograd has been taken over by Leon Trotzky. Military staff headquarters work is reported to be at a standstill, except the business of army supply.

The Volna Narodna says that within a few days Lenine and Trotzky will announce the successful establishment of a Workmen's and Peasants' Government, after which it is hoped that foreign Governments will enter into official negotiations through the new Foreign Minister.

A breach in the Workmen's and Soldiers organizations throughout the country is threatened through the existence of two central committees, each claiming authority as the duly constituted body, and denying the rights of the other.

War is a biological necessity of the first importance.—Bernhardi

WOULD JUSTIFY SACK OF VENICE

Austria Seeks to Justify City's Bombardment.

Would Place the Blame Upon Italy.

Venice Cable—"The Italian Government must declare whether the Queen of the Adriatic is or is not a fortified city," is the demand that Austria has addressed to Italy through the Spanish Ambassador. This is interpreted here as a desire by Austria to justify whatever destruction may be caused during the forthcoming operations.

All is in preparation here to meet any eventuality. B. Harvey Carroll, Jr., the American Consul, has had several conferences with his colleagues, especially the French Consul and the British Vice-Consul. All of them have decided to remain in the city up to the last moment possible. Admiral Cito, commander of the naval and military forces, has promised to provide transportation for themselves and their secret archives. It is stated that those of the papers of the Consulates which are found too voluminous to be carried away will be destroyed by their respective Consuls.

CANADA'S TRADE STILL BOOMING

Increase of Nearly $300,000,000 in Seven Months.

Big Increase in Export of Manufactures.

Ottawa Report — An increase of approximately $273,000,000 for the first seven months of the fiscal year ending with October, as compared with a similar period last year, is shown in the trade statement for October, just issued. For the seven months, the trade in the Dominion totalled $1,5[illegible],816,25[illegible], as compared with 1,213,189,651 last year. DEPENDS UPON U.S. SHIPPING

Easing of Position of the Allies Rests There,

Says Lloyd George at Noted Conference.

London Cable — In the same Downing street room and at the same table where 134 years ago England formally announced her recognition of American independence, a notable assemblage of American and British officials met to-day.

The American mission, headed by Col. E. M. House, represented the United States. Their British conferees included Prime Minister Lloyd George, Lord Milner, Sir Edward Carson, Gen. Smuts, Lord Chief Justice Reading, who presided, Lord Curzon and Chancellor of the Exchequer Andrew Bonar Law.

Officially the work of the committee constitutes a stock-taking of the and to some extent of the continental allies.

Col. House was not present, but was represented by his secretary.

Admiral Jellicoe, chief of the naval staff, arrived with Sir Eric Campbell Geddes, First Lord of the Admiralty. Lord Robert Cecil, the Minister of Blockade, walked unaccompanied from the Foreign Office. The crowds displayed deep interest in Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, chief of staff of the American army, and Admiral William S. Benson, who arrived separately with their aides. The Earl of Derby, British Minister of War, and Gen. Sir William Robertson arrived a few moments before Lieut.-Gen. J. C. Smuts, who drove up alone.

The conference lasted an hour and a half. The members had frequent recourse to the mass of statistics and official documents at their command.

Premier Lloyd George opened the conference with a speech which the conferees described as having been an important statement. The speech, like the rest of the proceedings, is being kept secret, but one conferee said the spirit of greatest earnestness and unity permeated the meeting, and that the most important practical results were achieved.

In the course of his speech Mr. Lloyd George said: "Assuming that the submarine situation does not get worse, the easing of the position of the allies depends entirely upon the dates on which the American programme of launching six million tons of shipping promised for 1918 comes into practical effect."

The Premier said he wished to recognize the eager earnestness with which the people of the United States are throwing themselves into the great task. He expressed absolute confidence that the great democracies now marching shoulder to shoulder would utterly overthrow the menace which threatened the liberty of the world.

The Premier thanked the mission for "the invaluable services which the United States navy had already rendered, not only in protecting commerce, but in dealing with the submarine, for vital assistance in financing the war and for effective help in many other ways."

With reference to the question of supplies, Mr. Lloyd George assured the mission that the most drastic food restrictions were about to be imposed upon the people of the British Isles.

GREAT ALLIED NAVAL DRIVE

Washington Hears Britain Has Agreed to It.

Will Adopt New Plan of Sea Offensive.

Washington Report — Unmistakable signs of Great Britain's willingness to forsake its defensive naval policy and heed the suggestions of the United States and the other nations warring with Germany have reached here. This was learned to-day on official authority.

Officials here in direct touch with the military and naval situation of the United States and of Great Britain believe that the plan for a great aerial and naval drive against Germany when the winter is over is likely to meet with the official approval of the British authorities, and that the great naval resources of Great Britain will be thrown into the drive to their utmost extent.

Quiet, but persistent, pressure has been brought to bear on British naval officials in London, and some who have been over here to bring about a change in the British attitude. It was said to-day that there are now reasons for believing that this change will soon be realized.

STILL BLOCK TEUTONS FROM ITALY'S PLAIN

Troops of Gen. Diaz Firmly Hold the Invaders in the North.

QUIET ALONG PAVIE

Pope Said to Have Secured Hun Promise to Spare Venice.

London Cable — Between the Brenta and the Piave Rivers, on the northern front, the Italians are tenaciously holding back the enemy and preventing his advance southward to the Venetian plain. Four times attacks against Monte Tomba, the chief position still blocking the way from the hilly country to the plain, have been repulsed by the Italians.

East of the Asiago Plateau the Italians are keeping up their offensive against the invaders, and have taken more than 300 prisoners and a number of machine-guns and several hundred rifles. Along the Piave River the enemy apparently has made no further effort to cross the stream following the serious losses he sustained in being driven back Monday from the Zenson bridgehead.

BERLIN REPORT.

The German War Office reports: "Strong Italian counter-attacks against the positions captured by us on the northern slope of Monte Tomba led yesterday to desperate fighting.

"The fire of our artillery and machine guns thinned the ranks of the enemy, who stormed in close masses, and our infantry drove him back into his former positions. Strong firing continues in this fighting sector.

"On the lower Piave there was nothing new to report."

GIGANTIC BATTLE IN NORTH.

Italian Headquarters in Northern Italy, Nov. 20.—The enemy is concentrating his attack on the north, and very heavy fighting is in progress south of Quero, where large enemy masses are attacking the Italian positions on Monte Tenera and Monte Tomba. The most desperate fighting to-day was in the vicinity of Monte Grappa, seven miles beyond Quero.

Scout planes to-day reported a tremendous and steady stream of enemy reinforcements arriving at enemy points back of the Teutonic lines. German big field guns are being brought into action.

Information is trickling across the Piave from Eastern Venetia now overrun by the enemy. According to these reports, Emperor Charles of Austria-Hungary has visited Gorizia and Udine, and King Ferdinand of Bulgaria has passed through Gradisca and Palmanova.

The garrison at Udine is said to be made up of Turkish soldiers, who are using the Church of Santa Maria as one of their barracks. On the citadel of Udine the invaders have raised five flags—the Austrian, German, Bulgarian, Turkish and Greek. The last flag represents the Greek division which went over to the Bulgarians at Kavala and Fort Rupel, and which some reports put among the enemy divisions operating on the Italian front.

LAST GERMAN GUN CAPTURED

With 1,000 More Prisoners, in East Africa.

Another Force Ringed in in Mahenge District.

London Cable — Sustained pursuit of the remaining German forces in German East Africa, during which nearly 1,5[illegible] prisoners were captured, important positions occupied and the last heavy gun remaining to the Germans in the colony taken intact is reported in an official statement to-day. The text reads: "Continuing the pursuit on the Makonde Plateau, we occupied Lutchemi on Saturday in the face of considerable opposition and took [illegible]. On Sunday we occupied a large enemy camp northwest of the Kitangari Mission station, capturing 5[illegible] Germans and Askaris. The remainder of the enemy has been driven into the Kitangari Valley. The [illegible] are approaching Newala from the south.

"The last of the enemy 4.1 howitzers was taken intact on the Mahiwa-[illegible] road, where it had been abandoned.

"Near Mandebi, 2[illegible] miles southwest of Liwale, the Anglo-Belgian force was engaged on Thursday and Friday with the enemy, who was endeavoring to break southwards from Mahenge.

"Exclusive of the enemy losses at Mangati, 738 Germans have been killed or captured by our various columns since November 1."

Presentation of Flag To Library Board

There was a fine gathering of the representative people of the town at the library on Tuesday evening last when the Women's Institute presented to the Library Board a handsome flag, which is to be used on the flagpole at the library.

Mrs. D. McTavish, "the mother of institutes" occupied the chair, and in calling the gathering to order took occasion to refer to the work of the institute. Mrs McTavish is one of the founders of this excellent organization in Ontario. She called upon the president, Mrs. H. M. Lowry, Mrs. J. Forrester and Mrs. Wismer, a charter member of the order, to present the flag

The library board, including Messrs. Stevens, H. D McLaren, H. Blindauer, J. D. Falconer, Ranney were on the platform, and received the flag and address, which was read by Mrs Wismer.

The chairman, Mr. Stevens, replied, thanking the ladies for their splendid gift, and also drew attention to the past favors the board had received from the institute. He took occasion also to suggest that the town council should have a flag for the town. In referring to the library he said that many persons were complaining about the library costing so much, and respectfully drew their attention to the fact that the town gave only three quarters of a mill, and comparing that with the service they got from the library he thought the complaints were hardly well taken. Everybody used the library for their meetings. If they would for one moment figure what it might cost to hold these meetings in other places, if there were no library, the library building would be much better appreciated.

Other members of the board, Messrs. Blindauer, Falconer and McLaren also made brief addresses.

There was a short musical program taken part in by Misses MacDuff, Martin and Smith, and Mr. R. E. Smith. The audience also joined in some patriotic songs.

Principal Potter, of the High School, made a splendid address, touching on education, and also referred feelingly to what the old flag meant to the world. Brief addresses were also made by Warden Izzard and E. R Sayles.

Mrs McTavish in closing the meeting said that the institute proposed to secure some useful apparatus for the purpose of taking care of the library grounds, and we may expect an even more beautiful place for the flag and its surroundings

The ladies are to be congratulated on the success of the presentation. It was carried out in splendid style and the evening was most profitable and enjoyable.

Dr Scanlan opened the poceedings with prayer.

Wants To Do His Bit

Rev. J. Howe, of Huntington, Indiana, a former Port Elgin gentleman, wants to do his bit and has written The Times that he wants to take out a bond. Mr. Howe concludes his letter as follows:—

The appeal finds me responsive, not simply for the sake of the investment, but for other reasons, for I can not look indifferently upon the struggle for "Victory" in this righteous cause without feeling a keen sense of responsibility, in so far as I am able to "do my bit". I am confident that the "Victory Loan" will be over-subscribed. May the victory for the allies in Europe be equally speedy and successful.

Electric Light Co. Replies

Walkerton Ont., Nov. 15th, 1917

To the Editor of The Times:

Dear Sir,—

I have read with interest the letter of Mr. Wismer in this week's issue of your paper in regard to the electric light.

Knowing Mr. Wismer as I do, I have no doubt that he wants to be fair.

I think we can take it for granted that the Hydro Electric Commission, which is only representing the people and is attempting to deal fairly between the people, would not have adopted the principle of charging a base rate according to the floor space without having fully considered the matter and come to the conclusion that that was the fairest way.

The base rate of the floor space is rated on not less than 1000 feet nor more than 3000 feet for any individual. The Company or Municipality furnishing electric current has to provide transformers and the secondary wires carrying the current from the transformers of the house of the user, and the interest on this investment and on the proportion of the primary wires and plant, and the costs of repairs have to be provided for in case customers did not take any current at all for short periods as sometimes is the case. This is sometimes provided for by charging a minimum rate based on the number of lights, so that the customer would pay for a certain amount even if he did not use current to that amount. This is what we did when first we established meters in Walkerton, and as there was a number objected to this, we decided in Southampton and Port Elgin, when we installed meters, to follow exactly the practise adopted by the Hydro-Electric commission, and charge the rates that were charged in Chesley, which was the nearest place supplied with Electric current by the Hydro-Electric Commission.

The floor space, in my opinion, is the fairest way of fixing a base rate, because the larger the house, the more lights are likely to be installed, and consequently the transformer capacity and the size of the wires is increased and the larger the transformer and wires, the more it costs as the transformer and wire capacity has to be sufficient to take care of all the lights in the house if burning at one time.

I may state that an official of the Hydro-Electric Commission said that he thought that we had been foolish in adopting the Chesley rates as, although he could not say positively, that he did not think it possible that the Hydro Electric Commission, if they supplied current to Southampton and Port Elgin from a distance, could furnish it at the same rate as they were charging in Chesley. However we did not desire to make any change.

Canada Loans 400 Millions

The Canadian government asked the people to furnish 150 million dollars for loaning to England to buy goods here.

And Canada has answered the call with 400 million of dollars.

And Port Elgin and the townships of Saugeen, Bruce and Arran had their share in this great and glorious accomplishment.

Port Elgin was asked for $20,000 dollars, and she loaned $76,550.

Saugeen was asked for $3500 and she came forward with $52,800.

Southampton was asked for $25,000 and it raised $69,000.

Bruce township, Tiverton and Underwood were asked to furnish $70,000 and $76,000 was secured.

Arran township and Tara was asked for $60,000 and it came along with $77,000.

Thus the canvassing system suggested by the Finance Minister has proven its value. In the last loan which was done entirely by the banks, this whole community centering in Port Elgin raised not much over $20,000, but with the work of the canvassers this was increased to ten times that amount for the district.

One lad of eleven signed up for a bond, while there were several persons over 70 invested. Quite a few young women and young men will begin to save, and to invest for the first time. Altogether 140 persons bought bonds in this town, or one in ten.

The buttons were late in arriving for the town canvassers, but those who did not get their Victory Loan button may get one at The Times office.

It is splendid that this district has done so well, and those who have an interest in the great Victory Loan will be greatly pleased over the results.

The total for Bruce county was over a million and three quarters.

Mr. David Robertson K. C., County Chairman, wired all the team captains on Monday congratulating them and and giving them their totals. Bruce county had in Mr. Robertson, Mr. McKay and Mr. Barber, a great trio, and they deserve great praise for the organization.

Public School Board

The public school board met on Monday night last, all the members present, excepting Messrs Black and Swalwell. A grant of $76 was received from the Department of Education. Inspector Bald's report for the past term was received which showed that the several departments were making good progress and the whole school in a high state of efficiency under the able management of Principal Aylesworth. Miss Tuft handed in her resignation to take effect end of the year. The board will advertise for a teacher for her room at a salary of $500. The principal's report for the month was presented which showed progress. A number of supplies for the several rooms were ordered to be procured and the secretary instructed to secure the balance of school levy in 1916 from the council.

A letter of condolence was passed and ordered sent to Mrs. McFadden, expressing the deep regret of the board in the sudden taking off of Mr. McFadden, a valued member of the board.

CARD OF THANKS

Mrs. McFadden and family greatly appreciate the many expressions of sincere sympathy extended to them in their bereavement.

Mr. and Mrs. Alex Geddes desire through The Times to thank so many friends for their kindness and sympathy in the death of their son, Lieut. John R. Geddes.

The family of the late Mrs. John Orford wish to thank the friends who were so kind to them during their recent bereavement.

Politicians' Column

Here's a New One

To the Editor of The Times

Dear Sir.—We have been reading much about a Bourassa-led Laurier, Liberals bought by German money, racial influence, Sinn Feiners, I. W. W's and what not.

In fact some of our papers say that if you vote Liberal, you are voting straight for the Kaiser of Germany. Some of our petty politicians go so far as to say if you do not vote Union you are a traitor. Sane thinking people know what all this means, simply the dying grasp of a drowning political party. However, here is the newest vote getter we have heard and as near as Bruce Township. It is reported that Tory canvassers are using the argument that through the influence of their good leader in North Bruce, the 160th Battalion is being held in England and thus in safety. Thus urging every man or women who has a relative in the 160th to vote for Mr. Clark.

We certainly do not accuse Mr. Clark of having anything at all to do with this argument, for experience has taught him that intelligent people would not listen to this, and we believe he is shrewd enough to see that when his party is asking more men it would not be in accord to say that he uses any influence to hold a trained battalion in England for over a year. Simply the old, old story over again, anything to catch an innocent voter.

"Common Sense"

[Advertisement]

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY

Mr. Charles M. Bowman attempts to prejudice the public mind against the Union Government candidate because of his position as Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. That office was created by Parliament in the session of 1916 without a dissenting voice. The work of the Prime Minister and Minister of Militia and Defence had grown enormously by reason of the war, and a parliamentary secretary was appointed for each. The Prime Minister selected the Member for North Bruce as his Parliamentary Secretary. Had he selected someone else nothing would have been heard about it in North Bruce As Parliamentary Secretary Col. Clark has relieved the Prime Minister of much official and clerical work, thus enabling him to devote his attention to the more important concerns of his office. In the session of 1917 parliament passed an act granting parliamentary secretaries the same salaries as the solicitor general, viz $5,000 a year. This is what Mr. Bowman complains of most, but has no hesitation in supporting Sir Wilfrid Laurier who draws the same salary as a Minister, viz $7,000 a year, for acting as leader of the Opposition.

Speaking on nomination day in reply to Mr. Bowman, Col. Clark said he was not able financially to live in Ottawa and do the work for nothing. "I should like to be able" he added "to serve my country at my own expense, but I do not think it would be fair for me to attempt to do it at the expense of my creditors."

BE NOT DECEIVED

Mr. John Macaulay advertises himself as "Liberal Candidate but supporting Union Government" and there are men and women who are deceived thereby into voting for Laurier.

What would they think and say if Col. Clark advertised himself as the "Unionist Candidate but supporting Sir Wilfrid Laurier?"

The fact is that if Mr. McCaulay is elected he will be counted as a supporter of Laurier. It will be one seat lost to the Unionist Government.

He is officially endorsed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and Sir Wilfred is not endorsing Union Government Candidates—not if he knows it. Mr. MacCaulay was nominated by a straight party convention. On July 20th, at a meeting of Liberal Candidates in Toronto he said :—

> "I am a new man and have not much to say. I agree with previous speakers in what they have said against Coalition and extension, and I think that if our leaders will agree on the platform everything will be all right. In my opinion Sir Wilfred is the man to lead us."

After the Union Government was formed he announced that he would support it on war measures, thus leaving himself free to defeat it on any other measure. At Port Elgin he complained because Hon. N. W. Rowell had declined to recognize him as a Union Candidate, and added that he was as strong a Liberal as ever.

Mr. Rowell was disposed to endorse Liberal Unionists wherever he had an opportunity, but Mr Macaulay's attitude was such that he could not do it in this instance.

Let no one be deceived: A vote for Macaulay is a vote for Laurier.

P. S.—Since writing the above new advertisements of meetings have appeared in which Mr. Macaulay is described as an "Independent Liberal." He has dropped the "Liberal Candidate, but supporting Union Government."

Lesson X., December 9, 1917.

Ezra and Nehemiah Teach the Law.—Neh. 8: 1-18.

Commentary.—I. Reading God's Word (vs. 1-8). 1. The people gathered—The completion of the walls marked an epoch in the life of the nation. The work had engaged the attention of all, and the people had realized the unifying effect of this common purpose. They also were constrained to acknowledge that God had been graciously favoring them. Before the water gate—The place of meeting was southeast of the temple before the watergate, through which water was carried for use in the temple. Ezra the scribe—Ezra had returned to Jerusalem from the land of captivity thirteen years before this time, but in the record of the events of twelve years his name was not mentioned. The general opinion is that he returned to Babylon, where he remained for several years, possibly engaged in copying the law. Bring the book of the law—It seems probable that Ezra's return prompted the people's request to have the law read to them. Which the Lord had commanded—It was the word of Jehovah. 2. Ezra the priest—Ezra was of the priestly tribe, being a direct descendant of Aaron (Ezra 7. 1-5). Brought the law before the congregation—The assembly included men, women and children, who could hear the law intelligently. The later rabbinical teaching was to the effect that women should be excluded from hearing the law, but that teaching was opposed to the word of God. First day of the seventh month—The month Tisri was the seventh month of the ecclesiastical year and the first month of the civil year, and the first day was a great day among the Jews. The month Tisri corresponds to the latter part of our September and the former part of our October. 3. From the morning until midday—The reading continued from early in the morning until noon. It is probable that the other read in turn, thus relieving Ezra. Were attentive unto the book—The people were intensely interested in the word of the Lord. They were eager to know what he would have them do, and then they would understand better their attitude toward him. This great interest showed that the religious life of the nation was being revived. 4. A wooden platform was constructed, raised sufficiently high to afford all in the congregation an opportunity to see the reader standing thereon. It was broad enough to accommodate Ezra and the persons mentioned in this verse.

5. opened the book—Books in those days were long strips of parchment rolled at either end upon sticks, and to open a book meant to unroll the scroll. all the people stood up—They had evidently been sitting while waiting for the reading to begin, and rose to their feet out of respect for the word of God. It is likely that they sat down after the exercises mentioned in the next verse, and remained sitting while Ezra read the book of the law. 6. blessed the Lord—Gave thanks. Amen—The people's response to Ezra's words of thanksgiving and praise. The word means, "So let it be." lifting up their hands—By this act they showed that they accepted the words read as the law of God and would be obedient to it. Lifting up the hands in worship is referred to in the scriptures (Psa. 63:4; 1 Tim. 2:8). bowed their heads....with their faces to the ground—They assumed an attitude of reverent humility. They were impressed with the goodness and mercy of God and the sacredness of his word. 7. The names here recorded are those of Levites who assisted in explaining the words of the law to the people. 8. read....in the law of God distinctly—Those who read were careful to speak clearly so that the great assembly could catch every word. The people were eager to hear and it was important they should. gave the sense—The Jews had been long in captivity and were unfamiliar with the law, hence explanations were needed that they might grasp the meaning of the word read. Some think that they had to a considerable extent lost the knowledge of the pure Hebrew language through their contact with their captors in Babylon. and caused them to understand—"So that they understood."—R. V.

II. Results of reading the law of God (vs. 9-12). 9. Tirshatha—This was a title given to Nehemiah representing his office as provincial governor. this day is holy unto the Lord—It was the new moon and as such was considered sacred. It was also a notable day because of the reading of the law. mourn not—The people wept upon hearing the law because it showed them how they had been sinning against God and his commandments. Their weeping was an indication of genuine penitence. It seems clear that they were ignorant as to the demands of the law. 10. eat the fat, and drink the sweet—A proverbial expression, meaning that the occasion was not one of fasting and grief. Rejoice. send portions. In the midst of their rejoicing they were to remember the poor by supplying them with that which would nourish and cheer them, thus adding to their own joy. the joy of the Lord is your strength—Religious joy, properly tempered by dependence on the help of God, meekness of mind and self-diffidence, is a powerful means of strengthening the soul. In such a state every duty is practicable and delightful. In such a them, thus adding to their own joy. the joy of the Lord is your strength—Religious joy, properly tempered by dependence on the help of God, meekness of mind and self-diffidence, is a powerful means of strengthening the soul. In such a state every duty is practicable and delightful. In such a frame of mind no man ever fell—Clarke. 11. stilled all the people—Restrained from mourning. neither be ye grieved—Sorrowful. 12. because they had understood—It was a source of grief to the people that they had been ignorant of God's law and had not lived according to its teachings. It became a cause of rejoicing to understand its requirements, its warnings and its promises.

III. Observing the Feast of Tabernacles (vs. 13-18). On the second day the reading and explaining the law was continued with "the chief of the fathers of all the people, the priests, and the Levites" as hearers. When it was read and understood that the Feast of Tabernacles should be observed on the fifteenth of the month, preparations were at once commenced for its observance. They gathered branches of trees and constructed booths upon the roofs of their houses, in the courts of their own houses, and of the temple, and "in the street of the water gate" at the southeast of the temple, and "in the street of the gate of Ephraim," probably in the north wall of the city, and led toward the land of Ephriam. It appears that all those who had returned to Jerusalem from Babylon constructed booths and sat under them. This feast was in commemoration of the journey of the children of Israel from the land of Egypt to Canaan. Upon this journey they had no houses in which to lodge, and during the feast of tabernacles the people dwelt in booths constructed of branches, in memory of that great deliverance. The feast continued for eight days, beginning with the fifteenth day of the month Tisri and closing with the twenty-second. It was a season of great rejoicing.

Questions.—For what purpose did the people assemble before the water gate at Jerusalem? What is meant by the law of God? Who was the reader, and how many assistants did he have? What classes of people listened to the reading of the law? In what manner was it read? What effect did the reading of the law have upon the hearers? How long did the study of God's word continue? What feast was observed? What event did the feast commemorate? What was the Jews' religious condition?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Spiritual progress.

I. Quickened through instruction.

II. Attested by practical service.

I. Quickened through instruction. The public reading and exposition of the law of Moses in the presence of all the people, as soon as possible after their settlement and the rebuilding of the walls around Jerusalem, took place on the anniversary of the restoration of the altar. The time was regarded with special interest. Through his labors Nehemiah had provided for the safety of the people. Ezra the scribe very appropriately gave instruction from the law of the Lord. The people evidenced their earnestness by listening attentively. It was in the faith that God has evermore blessed his own word as the chosen instrument of all revival progress in his church that Nehemiah sought to have the remnant of Judah instructed in the divine law. Having been long scattered in a strange land deprived of temple privileges, they were sadly defective in their knowledge of the divine law. Nehemiah's labors for their temporal security had inspired his brethren with patriotic love. He labored to inspire holy affection in their hearts. To do that he depended upon the diffusion of the knowledge of the holy scriptures.

God had raised up Nehemiah to perform a great work. Ezra, though endowed with different gifts, was his God-given associate in the great cause. They united in complete harmony for the revival of spiritual life in Judah. Nehemiah, having been invested with ruling power in the city, gave place to the ministers of the sanctuary in their proper work of teaching. On that occasion there was introduced a new element into the religious realm. Formerly the temple had filled the whole religious horizon to the Jew. It had been the place for sacrifice, not instruction. It was the sphere of the priest, not the scribe or prophet. God's ancient covenant with the people had largely passed from memory. When the congregation heard it again, it came before them as the revelation to a new discovery. They were overcome with penitential grief. Their tears were an expression of alarm and compunction, of apprehension for the consequences of their sins together with bodily sorrow on account of them. Nehemiah gave direction and counsel. Their sorrow was not wrong or without foundation, but defective in its views of divine mercy, in an apprehension of the loving kindness of the Lord, their covenant, their God. The law itself and the whole history of their fathers showed that their God was gracious and forgiving. The instructions and exhortations of Nehemiah, Ezra and the Levites prevailed to assuage their sorrow and enabled them to celebrate the festival in accordance with its full design. The grief can not be such as God demands if it hides from man the attributes of God and the arrangements divinely made for the pardon of sin. For the Jews at that time, feeble as they were, the joy of the Lord would be their stronghold, their fortunes against their enemies. It would serve to unite and inspire them and make brave. It would stimulate them in God's service, which was their safety, as it would secure their protection and blessing. It would impart inward power to do and suffer the will of God.

II. Attested by practical service. Combined with an exposition of the law was an exhortation to duty. With the joy of the Lord there was to be an overflow in charity. Nehemiah set the people about the common duties of life. There was hard work for those Jews to do. The whole task of religious reformation lay before them. They were to be filled with rejoicing for what the Lord had done for them in bringing favor and providing for their future religious life. That tranquil satisfaction must be accomplished by the discharge of duty as a practical demonstration of their spiritual revival. Under the quickening of a faithful ministry and the consciousness of renewed spiritual life, they returned to a complete and hearty observance of the ancient festival, the feast of Tabernacles, which was especially commemorative. The recalling of past exiles and past sorrows and wrong-doing confirmed their hearts in gratitude and devotion.

ANNOUNCEMENT ON FUTURE HOG PRICES

Statement of U. S. Food Administration in Full---What It May Mean to Canada.

The following is an announcement regarding future hog prices which was made by the Food Administration of of the United States Government on November 3rd. The statement in full is as follows.

The main purposes of the Food Administration as to hogs are four: To see that the producer at all times can count on a fair price for his hogs, so that it will be profitable to him; to see that the farmer increases the number of hogs bred; to limit the profit of the packer and the middleman, and to eliminate speculation. All of these purposes are necessary because we must have more hogs, so that the ultimate consumer shall at all times get an adequate supply of hogs at the lowest feasible prices.

We shall establish rigid control of the packer. Fair prices to the farmer for his hogs, we believe, will be brought about by the full control which the Food Administration has over the buying of the allies, our army and navy, the Red Cross, the Belgian relief, and the neutrals, which together constitute a considerable factor in the market.

The first step is to stop the sudden breaks in prices paid for hogs at the central markets. These prices must become stable, so that the farmer knows where he stands, and will feel justified in increasing hogs for next winter. The prices so far as we can effect them, will not go below a minimum of about $15.50 per cent. for the average of the packers' droves on the Chicago market until further notice.

We have had, and shall have, the advice of a board composed of practical hog growers and experts. That board advises that the best yard-stick to measure the cost of production of the hog is the cost of corn. That board further advises that the ratio of corn price to hog price on the average over a series of years, has been about twelve to one (or a little less). In the past, when the ratio has gone lower than 12 to 1, th estock of hogs in the country has decreased. When it was higher than twelve, the hogs have increased. That board has given its judgment that to bring the stock of hogs back to normal under present conditions, the ratio should be about thirteen to one. Therefore, as to the hogs farrowed next spring, we will try to stabilize prices so that the farmer can count on getting for each 100 pounds of hogs ready for market, thirteen times the average cost per bushel of the corn fed into the hogs.

Let there be no misunderstanding of this statement. It is not a guarantee backed by money. It is not a promise by the packers. It is a statement of the intention and policy of the Food Administration, which means to do justice to the farmer.

This clear statement as to the intention of the Food Administration in the United States will be received with satisfaction by hog producers, as Mr. Cotton frankly says, there is no money guarantee back of the minimum price of $15.50, but so far as the Food Administration can influence prices they will not go below the value of thirteen bushels of corn. Consequently, this statement, together with the fact that the Food Administration is controlling all reports of bacon, makes it probable that they will be able to hold the price at about $15.50 per cwt. on the Chicago market until a change seems necessary. The regulation of profits in the packing industry may also assist in stabilizing prices, and it remains to be seen whether the packers will do the square thing or try to force prices down to the minimum.

A very large share of credit is due to our esteemed contemporary "Wallaces' Farmer," for getting the Food Administration in the States to see the necessity of having a definite ratio established between the price of hogs and the price of feed, if the campaign for increased hog production is to be a success. For approximately the last two years that paper has been publishing a chart every month, showing the profits and losses in raising hogs, based on the relative prices of corn and hogs. As "Wallaces' Farmer" says in its issue of November 9th:

"In adopting the value of corn as the measure for determining the price of next year's pig crop, the Food Administration has pointed the way to the only road which is safe to travel in this perilous venture of price-fixing. All prices are relative. The dollar is no longer a true measure of value. Prices must be fixed in terms of the cost of production. Any other method will be fatal to production, and will bring about world famine condition. The adoption of the corn-hog ratio is the first recognition on the part of any government body that price-fixing must be in conformity with and not in violation of fundamental economic laws."

In establishing a ratio between the price of feed and the price of hogs here in Canada, it is better to use shorts or middlings rather than corn. In our last week's issue we published a chart showing the profits and losses in raising hogs during the last ten years, where the price of hogs was compared with the price of shorts in Toronto during this period. An interesting fact is that this chart, showing the profits and losses in hog raising for Canada, is in substantial agreement with the chart published in "Wallaces' Farmer," for the corn belt of the United States. During 1908 and 1909, when hog raising was relativley unprofitable in Canada it was relatively unprofitable in the U.S. In 1910 it was relatively unprofitable in both countries during 1913-1914 it was relatively profitable. During 1915, though the price of hogs was high, the price of feed was higher, also, and raising hogs was relatively unprofitable in both countries. In 1916 hog raising was profitable to both the farmer in the States and the farmer in Canada. In 1917, however, while hogs raising was relatively unprofitable to the American farmer on account of the high price of corn, it was profitable to the Canadian farmer, as the price of shorts remained at a comparatively low level.

No statement has as yet been made by Mr. Hanna which applies to Canada where any price is mentioned at which he will endeavor to keep the price of hogs. He has, nevertheless, said that he and Mr. Hoover are working in perfect accord, so that we may expect fair prices at least for hogs produced in Canada. Moreover, the price of hogs in the United States influences to some extent, at least the price of hogs in Canada.

Hogs at the time of writing are selling on the Chicago market for about $17.50 per cwt. which is about 50 cents per hundred more than they command on the Toronto market. If prices do go down to $15.50 in Chicago we would expect the price of hogs in Toronto to be about the same or a quarter or [illegible] cents per hundred less.

The average price of hogs for the last ten years was $8.25. The average price of shorts was $25.85 per ton. That is, it required the value of 7.17 hundredweight to induce farmers to stay in the hog raising business. When the price of hogs was higher than the price of 7.17 hundredweight of shorts, hog raising was relatively profitable when the price of hogs was lower than the value of 7.17 hundredweight of shorts, hog raising was relatively unprofitable. Since the Canadian Board of Grain Supervisors fixed the price of wheat in August, the price of shorts has been remarkably constant. It has been $42 per ton at Toronto for the past four months, practically without a break. As a rule, shorts is dearest during the months of September and October. During this period of 1917, it was selling for $42 per ton, so that we are apparently justified in assuming that if the price does not go down it certainly will not go up. According to the short-hog ratio, when shorts is $42 per ton, the price of hogs should be at least $15.06 f. and w., Toronto, if even a normal supply is to be maintained. —The Canadian Countryman.

SUNDAY AT HOME

CHANGELESS.

"The Lord has bidden His face," we sadly cry,
As we sit in the night of grief, with no helper by
"Guiding unnumbered worlds in their courses dim,
How should our little pain be marked by Him?"

But all the while we mourn the Lord stands near,
And the Son divine is waiting to help
and hear:
And 'tis we who hide our faces, and blindly turn away,
While the Sun of the soul shines on mid the perfect day.
—Susan Coolidge.

Thus saith the Lord: Behold, I set before you the way of life, and the way of death—I will teach you the good and the right way—I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me—Follow me.

There is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death.—Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life and few be that find it.

An highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.—Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord.

In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.

ANGEL ISLAND

(By the late Rev. T. H. Miller.)

Is there such an island: can I reach it, and shall I be welcome; will I find quality and equality? We can answer to you satisfaction. The face is paid, the ship is ready, come away. You ask may I? and we answer, yes!

People came to Jesus and asked foolish questions, one was, did the marriage relation obtain in heaven? "We do exceedingly err not knowing scriptures or the power of God. They neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God.

Angels are messengers, bringers of tidings. They are intellectual and immortal beings. They watch, they wait, they serve, they talk, they help, they sit, they go not from place to place, they are in every place; they are strong, wise, and stand in the presence of God unabashed; they encamp, they defend, they minister, they smite kings, confuse armies. They are the chariots of heaven!

Now the Master says of us, we are as the angels. How busy are the angels, they are submarine, under the sea; they are sub-terrean, under the earth; they are sub-lunary, under the moon; they are sub-missive, they are under law. They need no light, they are always ahead, they hearken, they do. They know not fear, regard not results; they smile with blindness, darkness and death, they bring pestilence, famine and the sword. They destroy, perhaps they create, they paint the flowers, the wings of birds, they garnish the heavens. They keep secrets, they bless women. They work in unity, harmony and purpose. They do not weep, or if they do, it is for joy. If they have a past, they have no future, they are ever present. They are sons of God; men are sons of God, and if you will think a little clearly, you will see that "now are we the sons of God," and we can go to this angel island and feel at home. Here you can visit, and stay, and be. You can be superior to time, flesh, and sea, space, hear the angels. You can be all this because you are a spirit.

Oh, wonder! we can live in two worlds at once—we can do our duty here and live above it. On this island humility dwells with dignity, majesty with meekness, exaltation through humility is the law of spiritual life.

"O peace—O holy rest,
O balmy breath of love!
O heart, divinest, best
Thy depth I prove!
I ask this gift of thee—
A life all lily-fair,
And fragrant as the place
Where seraphs are."

KINSHIP

Ah, not so blest are they, who stand
An envied throng,
Within the bulwarks of success,
Aloof and strong

As they, who, fighting heavy odds,
Their comfort find
In sacrifice that brings them near
All humankind
—Charlotte Becker.

CHRIST THE IMAGE OF GOD

The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together—No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him. And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father. The brightness of His glory, and the express image of his person—God was manifest in the flesh.

In whom we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins: who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature—Whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren.

As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.

ON BOARD

(By the late Rev. H. F. Miller.)

To step on board a ship is an interesting act, it is distinct and definite. You leave the shore and go on another element, an element that turns wives into widows every day.

I may go on board as a sailor, that is industrial; I may go as a passenger, that is commercial; I may go as a passenger, that is commercial; I may go as a prisoner, that is Governmental; I may go as a guest, that is glorious. "Come then and all thy house into the ark," said God to Noah. He went by invitation.

I once had a dream: "A stalwart swimmer hailed Noah one morning. "Come out and have a swim." Noah replied "The Lord shut me in and the latch is fastened on the outside, so I cannot come out, and a good thing, too."

An old sailor once gave his experience as follows. "It is a long time since I crossed the gangway, and came on board the Gospel Ship. You know there is always a gangway from the shore to the ship I walked that gangway a free man, and the commander was there to welcome me, I saluted Him, and passed under the order of a subordinate officer to my duty. When I passed the gangway it was hauled ashore and soon there was a space between the shore and the ship—it gradually widened, and very soon we were in the open. It is many a year since, but I have never been off duty, and never been ashore, for the Commander gives no vacations, and there are no holidays, yet we are happy.

I do my trifling duties about the deck, and now and then I catch a smile from the face of the Commander, and this is my best reward. The orders come from the quarter deck, the responsibility rests with the Commander, and I and all my mates, with all that is on board, are going to arrive, that is sure and certain.

"One peculiarity about this ship is that he has no pumps. The cry will never be heard from the boatswain. "All hands to the pumps; the ship has sprung a leak." That will never be, the ship is water proof, fire proof, storm proof, Devil proof. No pirate will ever heave in sight and demand surrender. How safe, how easy, how sure, how sure to arrive!"

That was a pretty long experience for an old sailor to give at an experience meeting, but it was given with force and fire, and they all believed it.

Jonah went to Joppa to ask what ships were on the berth. He fixed on the ship going the longest trip, 2,000 miles; he did not go on board by invitation, and as a guest; he had to pay. Those who come to God, come free; those who turn their back on God and run away, have to pay! They run fast and far when the devil drives—"Wherefore do ye spend money on that which is not bread?"

MONTREAL MARKETS

Montreal Report.—The offerings at the Canadian Pacific stock yards this morning amounted to 600 cattle, 800 sheep and lambs, 700 hogs, and 100 calves. Trading was good during the week, and the market was pretty well cleaned out. There are so few choice cattle offering that prices paid for the best were comparatively high. Choice steers especially were lacking. Butcher cows were a little better in price, some choice selling at $9. There was a good demand for canners' cattle selling at from $5 to $5.50. Lambs went as high as $16.50, while some good sheep sold at $12.50.

The Day is Growing Longer.

"Our earth appears to be slowing down its spin. Our English [illegible], who have just finished a long study of the earth's motion, report that it now takes almost exactly three seconds longer for the world to turn once than it took one thousand years ago; and, a century hence, another three seconds will have been added to the day.

"At this rate Shakespeare had nearly ten seconds less in his twenty-four hours than has a modern dramatist. William the Conqueror was handicapped a half-minute in keeping up with his descendants. Julius Caesar was a whole minute to the bad; while even if he had lived been some twenty of our days short of what his biographers would have claimed for him.

"Abraham and the early Pharaohs would have been still more pressed for time. The earliest men, say in the year [illegible] B.C., would have had no use for "How to Live on Twenty-four Hours a Day," for they had only twenty-three hours to do their living in, and were really only seventy-six years old when they thought they had reached fourscore."—Edward Tenney Brewster, in "St. Nicholas."

ASSAM Teas for Economy

Assam teas are the strongest and richest grown. It is of these teas that Red Rose Tea chiefly consists. That is why it yields the very large number of 250 cups to the pound—at the cost of about a cent for five cups, and every cup rich, strong, delicious tea.

Kept Good by the Sealed Package

Through Many Trials

And Dick Dumaresq, rather bewildered and flurried, can do no less than press the little white hands warmly in return, and muttering something vaguely and naively about "goodness," "gratitude," "exceeding kindness," and so forth, over and over again, takes his leave rather confusedly and hurriedly, with his hat well down over his eyes, walks away from Sir William Petherick's house and Oldington Gardens altogether, at the headlong pace at which a man walks who is trying to walk down his own thoughts.

A clear mile away, on a quiet, shady stretch of sidewalk, beneath a long wall overtopped by evergreens, shutting in some town-garden, he pulls up abruptly, and, standing against the wall, takes off his hat and lets the chill evening air cool his throbbing temples, for the "Wherefore?" is pursuing him still.

"For you know," he says, confidentially, addressing the nearest lamp-post, and staring at it unseeingly, "I might have fancied that was the real truth. I am not a born idiot any more than I am a fop or a coxcomb, I hope. I might believe that was the truth, odd and outrageous as it might seem, if she were not Imogene's sister. I can't think it—I won't think it of—her sister!"

He has come to a dead stop before the lamp, all unconscious of the fact, as well as of another fact, that from the opposite side of the road where trees and evergreens cast a deep shadow—two persons are intently watching him—two persons who watch him from different points of view and for as different reasons.

A man and a woman; and the man is watching the woman as intently as he watches Dumaresq, and as she crosses the road swiftly and follows him on the opposite sidewalk, the man, who is sauntering on smoking, darts on some distance ahead, crosses the road likewise beyond the turn, and so comes toward the turn, and the woman within a few yards unseen by them.

He is standing staring at the lamp-post yet when she comes beside him and touches his arm.

"Dick, won't you speak to me?" she says, in an undertone, and Dick Dumaresq starts violently.

"Good Heavens! Nellie!" he exclaims. "What is the matter? I thought you were far enough away!"

"And hoped I was dead and buried, I suppose!" the girl says, with bitter emphasis, and her words rang out on the chill, damp air in the autumn twilight.

"No—no, indeed, Nellie! Why do you say that?" Dumaresq says, soothingly, holding her hands, and the spy comes a little nearer, close in by the wall, until he can get a good view of the girl's face and figure.

"One of the 'ladies of the chorus' or 'ladies of the ballet.' Pretty features, under-sized figure, good eyes, yellow hair—at least at present—little, white teeth and a shrill voice. A shabby-fashionable get-up, plenty of black lace to set off the white powder and the blackened eyelashes, greasy black satin, and mock fur and little flounces and high heels on shabby boots."

Thus he sums her up, accurately and pitilessly, while Dick Dumaresq stands beside her, talking to her earnestly, persuasively; but of the conversation the spy can catch but a word here and there in the woman's tones.

"I don't care! I don't care now!" she says, once, in shrill excitement. "I have been treated so!"

Then Dick says "Hush!" in warning accents, and the spy saunters on toward them.

"Yes, I know! Let me go to the States, to San Francisco—to Jericho, anywhere out of the way!" she says, vindictively. "Never mind! I will take another journey on my own account into Herefordshire this time!"

"Hush! Nonsense! You won't do that!" Dick urges; and the listener, passing them closely, can hear the alarm and anxiety in the man's voice; "that would mean utter ruin, Nellie!"

"I don't care a pin!" she retorts, doggedly. "I've been put aside long enough—I'll stand it no longer."

Dumaresq urges some other plea, in a low voice, and she answers once more, shrill and passionate:

"Rights! rights!—I'll make my rights! I have rights! I have rights! the best of rights that I shouldn't be thrust aside out of sight and hearing!"

And then comes an outburst of hysterical sobbing, in which Dumaresq again tries soothing words or assurance, as the spy can tell by the tones of his voice; and giving the girl his arm, they came hurriedly along, overtaking the loiterer.

"There is a cabstand just on here a little way," Dumaresq is saying, encouragingly. "You are faint and ill from travelling, Nellie—that's what it is."

And she, sobbing angrily and despairingly, says, as she passes, in words half audible through tears:

"Only for her—I shouldn't care a pin what became of me. I'd as soon jump into the river—not, only for my little girl! I've nothing else to live for!"

"Hush! hush!" Dick says, feverishly, and hails a "crawling" cab almost in the same breath, hurries the girl in to it, jumps in himself, and they are both driven away.

The spy has overheard the address—a restaurant in the Strand.

And having seen all he can, he throws his cigar away, takes a few notes in his pocket-book and walks briskly on, with a businesslike air and a sedate face and keen expression, looking not like what he is—a human sleuthhound, a private detective.

But next morning, when he stands before his employer—a lovely, wealthy young woman—he represents himself [illegible] to the servants—his expression is not so much one of keen gravity as of uncertainty and inquisitiveness.

"She wants to pretend she believes him to be the guilty party, and not that double of his, his cousin and namesake; she wants to be very haughty and very indifferent and very much of the grande dame concerning Mr. Dick Dumaresq, and yet she will not allow for a moment that Mr. Dick Dumaresq and Miss Nellie Montesquieu, of the Cerulean Theatre, are anything more to each other than mere acquaintances. And though I know they're not, and know exactly how one Richard Dumaresq plays scapegoat to the other, both in this nice little piece of business as well as in other matters down in Herefordshire, Miss or Madam Montesquieu, I beg your pardon, knows where to have the gallant captain on the hip, yet my lady here won't allow this, that or the other. She won't clear the innocent, nor blame the guilty, and I'm blessed if I can quite understand my lady's little game or see the why or the wherefore of it all."

Thus muses Mr. Adams as he leaves the presence of Lady Petherick, the astute and beautiful Evelyn having thought well to employ an agent from a private inquiry office to discover what she desires to know.

It would seem as if Mr. Adams were troubled with a "wherefore" also.

CHAPTER XXVII.

And the "wherefore" haunts Dick Dumaresq every day and hour of the week that follows, until the day comes when, in obedience to the request made to him [illegible] a beautiful little creamy billet letter with a crest of monogram in crimson and silver on the top of the pages—he finds himself once more in "my lady's" dainty sitting room, in the glow of firelight and the soft radiance of porcelain lamps with pale-pink globes, for it is late in the evening—nearly eight o'clock, in fact—and Sir William is dining out.

And if Lady Petherick could have looked lovelier than she did in her quaint, soft brocaded tea-gown, she looks so to-night in her dinner-dress of black net and filmy laces, with plaitings of a soft salmon-pink silk—a delicate flower like shade, which matches well the cluster of exotic pale-pink blossoms in her corsage, cut square and low, so that the beautiful white throat and bosom gleam out like a pearl amid the cloudy tulle draperies.

She does not mar or conceal any of the classic beauty of the lovely, warm, white neck and breast by necklets or pendants, or any ornament, save the black velvet band around the full rounded throat, with its glittering diamond star in front.

On her beautiful rose white arms she wears no bracelet, save two slender gold bangles, whose rings shine like gold threads on the satiny skin.

But there are jewels enough on her delicate white fingers—emeralds, rubies and clusters of splendid diamonds, whose restless fire quite conceals the pale gleam of the unadorned wedding ring. More than once during that evening the thought occurs to Dumaresq that Lady Petherick's rings are typical of her life.

"I was going out to the theatre with a friend, until I recollected my appointment with you," she says, with a little smile of explanation, as she sees Dumaresq's eyes glancing at her dress and her fair, white throat, with its scintillating, splendid diamonds, as he wonders slightly if this be Lady Petherick's usual attire for a tete-a-tete dinner with her husband.

"I am very sorry if I have interfered with your arrangements," Dumaresq says, earnestly; "I can call at any other——"

"No—no—no!" she says, with her arch, bright smile—"you will do nothing of the kind. I haven't always an hour to spare, if you have. Sit down in that chair now, and listen to me."

He sits down, without a word, in the low, squabby fashionably ugly chair, a huge sunflower, embroidered on black satin on the seat cushion, and a row of little sunflowers glaring on the semi-circular cushioned rail at the back.

He sits down obediently, at her feet as it were; the "wherefore" is more and more visible each minute, and Dick Dumaresq, a little dizzy and confused, as a man intoxicated with some pleasant, subtle drug, "listens" as she bids him; looks at her as a man cannot but do, with eyes of admiration; yields to the fascination of her beauty, her kindness, her courtesy, and sweetness; as being mortal and masculine, flesh and blood, he cannot help doing, either, and so she lures him on, as she desires to do, casts a spell of her charm over his to spare and shield—against whom his loyal nature, as wicked women like Evelyn Petherick will do, if chance favor them, with the best and truest of men.

"I want to speak to you about your cousin," she says, in her soft, persuasive tones, "and to ask you, first of all, to forgive him, and then to set about fighting the wrongs—the bitter, shameful wrongs he has done you."

"Ah, you don't know all——" Dick begins, in a low, agitated tone, when she interposes, with her white hand laid on his arm.

"I do know all; more than you do. I know he has been selfish, and treacherous, and cruel to you since the hour you were boys together; when you defended him, and fought his battles for him, and shared his disgrace in his dishonor; when he forged his uncle's signature——"

"Who told you?" Dumaresq says, fairly springing up in dismay, but the firm, little white hand puts him gently back again.

"And how, in your generous, hot-blooded partisanship," she continued, "you ran away from home and took him with you; and when the cowardly, weak creature fell ill, you begged for forgiveness for him, and got him reinstated in his uncle's favor and the home of your boyhood at the cost of taking all the blame, all the disgrace, even to the suspicion of dishonesty, on your generous shoulders, poor fellow, and earned your uncle's bitter enmity as your sole reward!"

Dumaresq's head falls on his breast as he sits and listens to her, unable to even reply for the moment.

The memories her words arouse, and the mingled pain and pleasure of her words of pity and commendation—the first he has ever heard for the generous folly of his youth—almost overwhelm him.

"I can't think where or how you have learned all this," he says, in a stifled voice.

"Never mind," she answers, with her soft, slow smile brightening the soft, languorous darkness of her eyes. "I do know it, and much more. I know that you have been the scapegoat and victim of that wretched cousin of yours all the days of your life; but I am determined you shall be so no more. Heneage shall wrong you no more, Richard."

He hardly notices that she has called him by his Christian name; he does not heed the gentle tone, the sweet, slow smile with which these last words are said, so perturbed is he by her statements.

"I bear my cousin no ill will. I will not speak against him any more than I would wilfully hurt a hair of his head," he says, warmly. "Only I never wish to see him or speak to him again. I never wish to hear his name. He is not what I believed him to be, and—and—it has cut me up a good deal——" he falters over the last simple, unsentimental phrase. "I did not believe it for a long time—I can't quite believe it now—that Richard would slander me, and then send me on a fool's errand——"

"Down to Heneage Court, with that forged telegram?" Evelyn interposes, with that sarcastic curl of her lips. "One would think that the young gentleman's proficiency in that respect ten years before would have helped you to a pretty close guess as to the sender of that telegram!"

"Yes—I know—now," Dick says, slowly and reluctantly. "At least—I am almost sure."

"I am quite sure!" Lady Petherick says, vivaciously. "As sure as I am that he tried to get rid of you for an indefinite time by sending you on another fool's errand to Berlin, and Budapesth and Heaven knows where, to wait for Nellie Montesquieu, who was going to live abroad or sail from Hamburg to the States, he wasn't sure which—Nellie Montesquieu, the ballet girl, your cousin's mistress, poor little wretch, and the mother of his child. He wanted to get rid of her very badly, but he wanted to get rid of you worse, and so he got you to ship yourself off at a moment's notice in order to be abroad when the girl came, and ship her off to the States, or to establish her somewhere abroad. It was rather a wild, incoherent plan, invented on the spur of the moment, I should think!" Lady Petherick says, laughing; "but it served his purpose; you went off without demur or delay."

"I wrote to Sir Philip asking for an extension of leave for a week, begging him for it in the humblest terms," Dumaresq interposes, flushing, "offering every apology and explanation in my power. Richard said I need not be absent for more than a week, he thought, and that would really be only five days beyond the time he had given me himself."

"And Richard was intrusted to deliver your letter [illegible], of course," Lady Petherick smiles. "Poor fellow! How [illegible] you [illegible]"

"Yes, I [illegible] he never delivered it, and wrote me [illegible] said, and that [illegible] no remark, and then detained me for day after day in Berlin, waiting for money. He has promised me remittance [illegible] and spent all the money I possessed at travelling to one place or the other." Dumaresq falters, agitatedly; "It was [illegible] I would hardly say no more about it, [illegible]"

"You are treated you so utterly and heartlessly as if you were a [illegible] bird!" she says, with glancing [illegible] and heaving breast, "and you must remember that when you are inclined to [illegible] in demanding justice for yourself! You may pity [illegible] have a noble, generous nature, but you must have your rights, Richard; you must [illegible] Viscount Dumaresq [illegible]——"

"I never could; I never will try," he says, firmly and darkly.

"You can—you will—you must!" Lady Petherick says, passionately, and [illegible] eyes are full of light, and her crimson lips quiver with excitement, and her diamonds scintillate and [illegible] of her little jeweled hands are raised clasped in pleading to him. She draws nearer to him, she bends [illegible] her perfumed [illegible] of hair touch his crisp brown hair.

"You must, Richard, or do you know what will be the result? Your cousin—your dear cousin, whom you want you will not utter a word in self-defense—your cousin circulates the story that wrongs your dead mother, Richard. You cannot suffer that!" she cries with tears in her violet eyes, tears in her trembling voice, the white bosom panting with emotion.

But the tears cease, there is almost a smile of triumph on her lips, as she sees that she has not miscalculated the effect of her words.

The man starts convulsively, as if he had been stabbed, every vein swelling in his temples, his eyes glittering like lightnings in the cloud of his face and a smothered oath—the first time he has sworn in a woman's presence—bursts from his lips.

"Richard said that?" he asks hoarsely, his words half audible only through gathering excitement. "Richard said that? Then I know now,—I never knew before—why Sir Philip spoke so insultingly, looked so contemptuously, at me! Richard to say that of me, his elder cousin, his uncle's lawful nephew and heir?"

"You can never suffer that to be repeated again, for your dead mother's sake," Lady Petherick interposes once more.

"No! As Heaven hears me, I will murder him if I ever can hear him say it, or trace it home to him!" Dick says, madly. "I will have vengeance on him—I will punish him for all the past, aye—with interest."

"You certainly must silence his malicious tongue, for your dead mother's sake," Lady Petherick repeats.

"I will—as heaven hears me, I will, and punish him for it, too!" he says, bitterly.

And then, as she has brought him to this pass and state of feeling, she is satisfied and resumes her former role of tender friendliness and gentleness.

"Be calm, Richard," she says, with sisterly soothing, "and remember that those who know you, and regard and esteem you, need no assurance to make them consider you more worthy of their regard."

There are certain tones, certain wistful pauses and suppressed, pathetic glances in this speech, which convey a hundredfold more than the words that compose it, but still he does not, or he will not, heed her.

Hard to Drop Meat?

All depends on what you eat as a substitute. It is a good time to study "food value." You may be eating the wrong foods, the foods that cost most and give the least nutriment. Shredded Wheat Biscuit contains more real, body-building nutriment, pound for pound, than meat, eggs or potatoes and costs much less. Two of these Biscuits with milk and a little fruit make a nourishing meal at a cost of a few cents. Make Shredded Wheat your "meat." A satisfying breakfast on which to start the day's work. It is ready-cooked and ready-to-eat. Made in Canada.

MRS. KIESO SICK SEVEN MONTHS

Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Aurora, Ill.—"For seven long months I suffered from a female trouble, with severe pains in my back and sides until I became so weak I could hardly walk from chair to chair, and got so nervous I would jump at the slightest noise. I was entirely unfit to do my housework, I was giving up hope of ever being well, when my sister asked me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I took six bottles and today I am a healthy woman able to do my own housework. I wish every suffering woman would try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and find out for themselves how good it is."—Mrs. Carl A. Kieso, 590 North Ave., Aurora, Ill.

The great number of unsolicited testimonials on file at the Pinkham Laboratory, many of which are from time to time published by permission, are proof of the value of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, in the treatment of female ills.

Every ailing woman in Canada is cordially invited to write to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential), Lynn, Mass., for special advice. It is free, will bring you health and may save your life.

Poultry House Disinfection

The principal factor in the eradication of poultry diseases is the adoption of proper sanitary measures at the outset. Infectious disorders will recur no matter how wisely treated, unless such treatment is supplemented by the liberal use of efficient disinfectants. Disinfection is the one basic principle upon which rests freedom from disease and prevention must occupy the foremost place if headway is to be gained.

The proper method of disinfecting fowl houses is as follows: Remove all litter from the floor and nesting places and burn as near the building as convenient to avoid contamination of the surrounding soil. If possible remove nests, roosts and other portable fixtures and place in the sunlight. Empty all hoppers, feed bins, etc., of dry mash and other grains and discard grit or scald with boiling water before using a second time. Scald all utensils, pans, etc. If cotton fronts are used, these should be removed and either washed thoroughly or scalded with boiling water. The windows should be taken out and washed with warm water and soap, the frames being well scrubbed with a hard brush. If straw lofts are used, the straw should be removed and burnt with the litter. The inside should then be thoroughly swept down to remove cobwebs, dust accumulations, etc., or if possible, flushed out with a good hose. All accumulations of hard droppings should be loosened by softening with water and then scraped clean with a hoe or other sharp instrument. Disinfection may now be commenced. Mix fifty pounds of unslaked or quick-lime in a barrel of water and add to this one gallon of good commercial disinfectant. If a smaller amount is required it may be mixed by adding two and one-half pounds of quick-lime to a pail of water plus half a teacupful of disinfectant. Be sure that the lime is not slaked by exposure to the air as all its disinfecting power is thereby lost. The correct method of applying the lime-wash is by means of a spray-pump which can be purchased at a reasonable cost and can be used to advantage in other buildings. Before using the lime solution it is advisable to strain it through a fairly fine sieve or cheesecloth, as the filter is liable to become clogged. In the absence of a spray-pump, a whitewash brush may be used, although it is difficult to fill the cracks and crevices without a strain to drive in the solution. These cracks serve as breeding places for mites, lice, etc., and should be given careful attention. Where an infectious disease, such a Tuberculosis has been present, it is wise to spray the interior at least twice with an interval of one week between each application. Otherwise one good treatment will be sufficient. The runs, if not too large, should be covered with a thin coating of air-slaked lime and then spaded or plowed to a good depth. If lime is not available a thorough spading may be sufficient although less effective the former method. The runs should be changed each year if possible or divided [illegible] half being sown to rape or other [illegible] crop. This cropping destroys the breeding places of worms, etc. If portable houses are used, they should be moved frequently as feeding fowls and [illegible] on the same ground year after year serve to infect them with numerous diseases. Allow the fowls open range if such is available.

Disinfect in the spring and fall if possible and by all means in the fall before introducing fresh stock into the fowl houses.

THE CAUSE OF BACKACHE

Every muscle in the body needs constantly a supply of rich, red blood in proportion to the work it does. The muscles of the back are under a heavy strain, and have but little rest. When the blood is thin they lack nourishment, and the result is a sensation of pain in those muscles. Some people think pain in the back means kidney trouble, but the best medical authorities agree that backache seldom or never has anything to do with the kidneys. Organic kidney disease may have progressed to a critical point without developing a pain in the back. This being the case, pain in the back should always lead the sufferer to look to the condition of his blood. It will be found in most cases that the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to build up the blood will stop the sensation of pain in the ill-nourished muscles of the back. How much better it is to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for the blood than to give way to unreasonable alarm about your kidneys. If you suspect your kidneys any doctor can make tests in ten minutes that will set your fears at rest, or tell you the worst. But in any event, to be perfectly healthy you must keep the blood in good condition, and for this purpose no other medicine can equal Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

You can get these pills through any dealer in medicine, or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

WILY CECIL RHODES.

The Way He Discovered the Diamond Fields of South Africa.

Have you ever heard how diamonds were discovered in South Africa? And did you know that Cecil Rhodes was the man who made the discovery? But here is the story:

A German trader in skins and ostrich feathers from the interior, with Pietermaritzburg as his frontier station, drove into Cape Town one afternoon. He had been two months bringing in his wagons, each drawn by ten yoke of long-horned oxen, from the frontier trading post named.

This trader, among other curious things, had a dozen or so very brilliant pebbles, which he was showing to his friends.

"Fine specimens of globular quartz," said a doctor newly arrived, who had just enough of a smattering of geology to know nothing at all about it.

"Would you mind giving me one or two of those pebbles?" said a tall, dark skinned, slender young man. "Or I will buy them from you at whatever you may consider them worth. I have no such stones in my collection at home."

"My dear sir," the other replied, with the heartiness of a dweller on the veldt, "you are very welcome to a couple. Pick out any two you may fancy."

The dark young man selected two about as large as a medium-sized hickory nut, thanked the trader and immediately sent the "globular quartz" off to Amsterdam. As he thought, the report came back saying that the stones were diamonds of incomparable flawlessness. Then started the rush to the diamond fields.

Wonderful Memories.

Michelangelo had on his lips the greater part of the poetry of Dante and Petrarch, and Galileo could repeat most of Ariosto, Petrarch and Berni. Justus Leipsius knew Tacitus by heart and could repeat any passage called for. Locke states that Pascal knew the whole of the Bible by heart. Liebnitz, even in old age, could repeat nearly all the poetry of Vergil, word for word. Saunderson knew by heart Horace's odes, Cicero's "Offices" and a large part of Juvenal and Persius. Porson, the great English scholar, declared that he could repeat "Roderick Random" from beginning to end.

Food and Strength.

Remember that the food you take one day supplies the strength you put forth the next. It is then a mistake to take a heavy meal on the day of heavy work. The time to take it is the day before.

Wise stablemen know this, and when a horse has a long day's drive before him they give him only what is called a "check feed," a very light meal, to be followed at night with a heavy one.

So there are two good reasons for a man's not eating much on the day of stress. It adds nothing to his strength on that day, and the process of digestion calls the blood to work at the stomach when every ounce of it is needed at the brain.

Rainbows.

The time of day or the state of weather when a rainbow appears is believed by many people to be an indication of future weather conditions. According to an old rime, a rainbow in the morning warns the shepherds to be prepared for rain shortly; an evening rainbow points to fine weather the next day. Sailors believe that a rainbow in the wind is a sure sign of continued wet. If it comes in the opposite quarter the rain will soon stop. Again, if in fair weather a rainbow be seen foul weather will speedily set in, but if the bow appear in foul weather fair weather will be at hand.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

How can we pretend friendship towards the soldiers and refuse the reinforcements for which they ask.

These are the days when the voter becomes important. It's about six years since he; has found himself so much thought of.

The women who have votes for the first time will realize how uncomfortable it is, especially if they really want to be kind to the goat who has pledged himself "to find out how she votes."

* * *

This war will last long enough to try every man to the soul No man can hide from the responsibilities of this world carnage. Wretched is he, indeed. who is not under conviction of those brave men who have given their lives in defence of the liberty we enjoy.

When the editor of The Times first came to this part of the province he was constantly reminded by many friends in the surrounding townships that a certain Toronto paper was their Bible. We mean no offence, of course when we ask if this newspaper is being regarded so religiously just now.

The Toronto newspapers are cartooned as being a "Newspaper Union" because they are all agreed upon Union Government, which is almost enough to dishearten the man who favors Union Government from an honest conviction. We admit, however, it is pleasant, in these trying times to see these men agreed. They're as "thick as mush" just now.

It is not in the power of man to spread the suffering and privation of this war over the people evenly. Some will have greater wealth, some greater pleasures. There are profiteers, but the profiteers are not all in those higher up If we have laid up greater store, while the other man has laid down his life, whether that store be much or little, are we not in the profiteer class?

* * *

There are a couple of Editors in London who edit, under ordinary circumstances, two good papers. Since this election, however, both men are over reaching in an effort to out do the other, The unfortunate part of the tirades of both papers is that they are not confined to London, and their vicious attacks on the prominent men of Canada are being read in the districts, where better judgment is expected of such able men,

* * *

Those who are letting their passions rise in their eagerness to advocate one or the other present politicians, should remember that it's a long while before this election is decided. Although voting here takes place on December 17th, it will be in the middle of January before all the soldiers will have voted, and before it will be possible to tell exactly what has happened. Some men are carrying a great load of steam, or spleen, if you like, and it would be just as well to cool down the fires.

The Kitchener and Sherbrooke outbreaks of rowdyism can do no good to the towns in which they happen, or harm to the Unionist cause. Already Kitchener people have begun to reap a harvest of distrust, and many righteous people must suffer because of the hoodlumism of a few. The manufacturers have discharged from their works men who were supposed to have had anything to do with the crowd that handed the insult to the Canadian Premier, while the city stands to lose several good manufacturers, which have announced their intention of going elsewhere Letters continue to pour into these concerns from wholesalers that no more of their goods will be needed as long as manufactured in Kitchener, and so harm is done to a great many people through a few hundred ill-advised rowdies. Every election time finds certain individuals, not only in Kitchener and Sherbrooke, but everywhere, who imagine that they have a license to badger and insult those who do not see eye to eye with them.

LUX

To give sweater coats a new lease of life

Now that sweater coats are getting more expensive, it is more than ever desirable that you wash yours with LUX. Of all things a sweater coat, which is seen so much, must be kept soft, fluffy, fleecy and "new" in appearance. You can keep yours that way and wash it again and again if you do this:

> Pour boiling water over LUX flakes—pure essence of soap—allowing 3 or 4 tablespoonfuls for every gallon of water you use. Whip into a creamy lather—a few seconds is needed. Then put in the garment and stir it about. Let it soak until cool enough for your hands to squeeze the water out of the coat—the dirt just runs away. Rinse in two or three relays of tepid water, and hang to dry.

Very simple. Anyone can do it—just a few minutes' work and you get a result that the most expert French cleaner might well envy.

LUX won't shrink woollens. Won't hurt any fabric or color that pure water can safely touch.

Get Behind the Wheel of a Ford and Drive

TRY it just once! Ask your friend to let you "pilot" his car on an open stretch. You'll like it, and will be surprised how easily the Ford is handled and driven.

If you have never felt the thrill of driving your own car, there is something good in store for you. It is vastly different from just riding—being a passenger. And especially so if you drive a Ford.

Young boys, girls, women and even grandfathers—thousands of them—are driving Ford cars and enjoying it. A Ford stops and starts in traffic with exceptional ease and smoothness, while on country roads and hills its strength and power show to advantage.

Buy a Ford and you will want to be behind "the wheel" constantly.

"The Village School Ma'am" Very Well Played

The town hall was packed to the doors on Friday night, when the members of the Soldiers' Friend Club produced "The Village School Ma'am".

The first day the regular plan opened every seat was taken, so well had the girls canvassed the town and sold tickets. Then the plan was revised, and another hundred people were crowded in, and there are still some who were unable to secure admittance.

For some weeks the young people, under Mrs. Busby, had been practicing hard, and as a result they had their parts up in good style, and the acting was splendid.

When the curtain went up there was a first-rate setting of a country store, with its display of rakes, shovels, rope, barrels, salt, etc., on the outside with sign "Store and Postoffice". Sitting outside whittling sticks and swapping stories was Hosea Clegg, an old veteran of the civil war, or supposed to be, and also Sam Alcott, the hen pecked husband, who had occasional rows with Hosea, as to whether the latter was ever a real soldier.

The story goes along about a pretty girl who was hired by the trustees to teach school. She had a past, and the country folk were busy trying to find out just why such a talented and refined person should teach school in so small a place. One day James Graham, a traveller, comes along to sell goods to the country store keeper, and while doing so has a flirtation with Ida May Alcott, who has a very high opinion of herself. It works out that Jim Graham is the divorced husband of the school teacher, and the two meet, while Jim is kissing the pretty Ida May. The school ma'am calls Graham to task, and the country folk seeing the two together, especially Miss Pratt, the dressmaker, is shocked, and the gossip gains great hold.

Finally the trustees want the teacher to resign, owing to the gossip about her past history. The school ma'am finally catches her divorced husband trying to elope with Ida May. The couple are caught, and Jim Graham is shown up for what he is, while Mr. Elliot the village storekeeper and Sylvia Lennox, the teacher are betrothed. Hosea Clegg and Miss Pratt are also engaged and everything ends smoothly, excepting with Graham. The minister, Rev. Flick, was right near, and we may suppose these couples are like the story books, "living happy ever afterwards".

In the play there were also Mrs. Alcott, who seemed to forget everything, who kept her family running back to the store for things she had forgotten. Then there was "Tad" the country lad, who worked around the store, and "Posey," born tired, who, while slow, seemed to be in the right place at the right time. Miss Pratt, as the village dressmaker, was a perfect character, and with Hosea Clegg, and Sam Olcott were well made up, their costumes being exceptionally suitable.

The more dramatic parts of the play were taken by Richard Elliott, James Graham, Sylvia Lennox and Ida May Alcott. Their acting was indeed very clever. Mrs. Alcott was also cleverly acted out. Tad and Posey made a great pair, and their parts were performed just right. Hosea Clegg and Sam Alcott were humorous, and their parts well done. The Rev. Mr. Flick was properly portrayed, the sober mien being carried out without a smile, even under trying circumstances.

Altogether the young people showed themselves to be very adept on the stage, and the applause was frequent. All conducted themselves with credit, which reflected as well to their teacher, Mrs. Busby.

Raynor's orchestra was a fine feature of the evening, and their music was thoroughly enjoyed.

Between the acts the girls sold home made candy neatly boxed, and at the conclusion the handsome wrist watch donated to the club by Mr. Busby, was drawn for, and won by Miss Mina Bock.

The entire affair was most successful, and the Soldiers Friend club are to be congratulated. Nearly $175 was made from admissions, candy and the watch.

At the close of the proceedings the great crowd arose and gave three cheers and a tiger for the soldier boys away and the girls at home, and then the national anthem heartily sung.

Following is the caste of characters:

Why Don't They Say What They Mean?

Occasionally Reeve Izzard gets a little bit "huffy" but not often. If you want to see him with his bristles out just be around some day when a telgram is handed him and he reads:

"To The Mayor of Port Elgin
"One returned soldier leaves London at 4 55 p m to-day."

The reeve and council always want to give a welcome, and when messages come like that it is rather unfair. Why cannot the military authorities at London say who this man is, and at least say where he is going. Because a man leaves London at 4 55 may not mean that he is coming to Port Elgin.

On a couple of occasions recently many people have been gathered at the station to make a welcome, and the soldier has not returned. While on two occasions at least, soldiers have returned to town and did not get a welcome.

The reeve suggests that if the military authorities go to the trouble of sending any telegram, why not send it right.

The Proper Care of Milk

Milk, to keep properly, should never get warmer than 50 degrees Fahrenheit until it is consumed. The lower the temperature the better the milk will keep.

Bacteria—such as those which cause milk to sour—develop very slowly and cause little change in milk kept at such low temperatures.

A slight rise in temperature, even for a short time, permits these bacteria to multiply rapidly and bring about rapid deterioration of the milk, which may render it unfit for ordinary use.

Don't leave your milk bottles on a hot porch or doorstep. A short exposure in the sun or a warm place hastens the spoiling even of cold bottled milk.

Have the milkman put milk into the refrigerator. If this is impossible provide in warm weather a box with ice or a bucket of water in a shady place for the milk.

At any rate have the bottles left in the coolest and shadiest place about your premises.

Don't leave milk in bottles or vessels in a warm room for a moment longer than is necessary.

Never pour milk which has been exposed to the air back into a bottle containing other milk. Keep such milk cold and covered in another clean utensil.

Keep milk bottles covered either with caps or by placing glasses over them. Keep them covered in the refrigerator and in the kitchen or dining room.

Never pour milk into an unsterile bowl or pitcher. Scald all vessels into which milk is poured for keeping or serving. Cool these utensils after scalding before putting milk into them.

Before opening a bottle of milk wash and wipe the outside of the cap with water and a clean cloth. The little depression at the top of the bottle collects dust or water or milk, which may attract flies. Lift out the cap with a pointed instrument, so that the outside of the cap, which may be contaminated, will not be pushed down into the milk.

Clean and scald the refrigerator where milk is stored regularly with hot sal soda solution. See that the drip pipe is kept open and clean.

Even in the cleanest refrigerator never keep milk in an open vessel. Milk absorbs odors easily.

If there are babies or little children in the home clean, cold, covered milk is absolutely essential.

Finally, clean empty bottles. Rinse thoroughly with cold water every milk bottle as soon as emptied and then wash with hot water. This helps the milkman to supply clean milk.

Never take milk bottles into a sick room. If there is an infectious or contagious disease in your home boil the milk bottles and do not return them without the express sanction of your local health officer or attending physian.

Clean skim milk is a valuable food, containing all the nourishing elements of whole milk except the fat or cream. It is useful in cooking cereals, soups, cocoa, etc., and is a palatable, nourishing beverage.

Sour milk and buttermilk can be used with soda in making hot breads, or sour milk can be easily turned into cottage cheese or clabber. Sour cream is a good shortening for cakes and cookies and is useful for salad dressings and gravies for meat.

SPARED HER HOME.

Belgian Woman's Charity Touched the Huns.

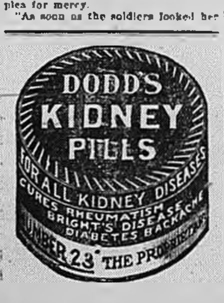
Albert Rhys Williams, relating his experiences while "In the Claws of the German Eagle," tells the story of the Belgian peasant woman who saved her little home from the Germans by kindness. "Below Argentau," says Mr. Williams, "there was a vine-covered cottage before which stood a peasant woman guarding her little domain. Her weapon was not a rifle, but several buckets of water and a pleasant smile. I ventured to ask how she used the water. She had no time to explain, for at that very moment a column of soldiers came slowly plodding down the dusty road. She motioned me away as though she would free herself from whatever stigma my presence might incur. A worried look clouded her face, as though she were saying to herself: 'I know that we have been spared so far by all the brigands which have gone by, but perhaps here at last is the hand that has been appointed to wipe us out.' This water, then, was a peace-offering, a plea for mercy.

"As soon as the soldiers looked her way she put a smile on her face, but it ill concealed her anxiety. She pointed invitingly to her pails. At the sight of the water a thirsty soldier here and there would break from the ranks, rush to the pails, take the proffered cup, and hastily swallow down the cooling draught. Then returning the cup to the woman, he would rush back again to his place in the ranks. Perhaps a dozen men removed their helmets, and, extracting a sponge from the inside, make signs to the woman to pour water on! it; then, replacing the sponge in the helmet, marched on refreshed and rejoicing.

"A mounted officer, spying this little oasis, drew rein and gave the order to halt. The troopers, very wearied by the long forced march, flung themselves down upon the grass while the officers' horse thrust his nose deep into the pail and greedily sucked the water up. More buckets were being continually brought out. Some of them must surely have been confiscated from her neighbors who had fled. The officer, dismounting, sought to hold converse with his hostess, but even with many signs it proved a failure. They both laughed heartily together, though her mirth I thought a bit forced.

"I do not remember witnessing any finer episode in all the war than enacted in this region where the sky was red with flames from the neighbors' houses, and the lintels red with blood from their veins. A frail little soul with only spiritual weapons, she fought for her hearth against a venging host in arms: facing these rough, war-strained men, she forced her trembling body to outward calm and graciousness. Her nerve was not unappreciated. Not one soldier returned his cup without a word of thanks and a look of admiration.

"Nor did this pluck go unrewarded. Three months later, passing again through this region as a prisoner, I glimpsed the little cottage still standing in its plot by the flowing river. I want to visit it again after the war. It will always be to me a shrine of the spirit's splendid daring."



$35,000 of Ambergris in a Lump.

A prize lump of ambergris secured by the whaling brig Viola is reported by Capt. John A. Cook, of Provincetoo, owner of the vessel. The chunk of ambergris taken from a sperm whale captured just south of Cape Hatteras, weighed 121 pounds, and was valued at $35,000. Each man of a crew of sixteen will have a share in the prize.

Another old whaling barque of the New Bedford fleet returned to port recently after a four-years' cruise. This was the Wanderer, built at Mattapoisett in 1878 and still apparently as sound as the day she was launched. The Wanderer had pretty good luck on her return cruise. In all she took 6,200 barrels of sperm oil, valued at $160,000.

Most of this was sent home via the Azores and Barbadoes. Capt. Antoine Edwards, commander of the vessel, figured that an average catch of $40,000 a year was not so bad these days.

FREE FROM BEETLES.

Spitzbergen is the Only Land in the World Without Them.

One of the most amazing things in natural history is the way in which beetles have triumphed in the struggle for existence, says the Popular Science Monthly. Of all creatures they are by far the most numerous, no fewer than 150,000 distinct species having been identified—three times the number of backboned animals.

Beetles are found practically everywhere—in the frost bound tracts of Iceland and in the hot desert sands of Africa, on the highest mountains, under the ground and as fossil in the deepest strata, on land and in water, on plants, among stones and in wood and earth and even in the very craters of volcanoes.

But there is one place where no beetle has yet been found. It is the inhospitable land of Spitzbergen, to the north of Russia. Here are found the migrant birds, fish, mollusks, crustaceans, a few insects of varied species and many spiders, but not a single beetle.

While other insects have succeeded in some way in migrating from the mainland, the beetles have apparently been unable to cross the wide, icy waters.

More than 45,000 clerks in England have been replaced by women.

While other insects have succeeded in some way in migrating from the mainland, the beetles have apparently been unable to cross the wide, icy waters.

COURT ETIQUETTE.

Much Needless Ceremony in Olden Times.

Royal personages as well as those members of noble families who have the privilege of attending on them would find the cares connected with their high position considerably increased if the extravagant formalities which attached to court life two or three centuries ago were still in vogue.

Precedence ruled in all things at the Court of Louis IV., at Versailles. Even the king's morning toilette was made in the presence of the courtiers, who were continually arriving. As the king put on his outer garments, these were handed to him by the nobleman of the highest rank in attendance.

The story is told that, as the king was pulling on his waistcoat one morning, it was handed to him by a count; but before the count had passed the garment to the king, a duke came in.

This made it necessary for the count to hand the waistcoat at once to the duke, as it would have been against etiquette for a person of lower rank to pass the garment. And as it must be handed with the bare hands, the king had to wait the duke removed his gloves.

When this operation was performed, and the duke was about to advance with the waistcoat, the door again opened and a royal prince of a younger branch of the family entered. This duke, of course, at once presented the waistcoat to a new comer, as he was a higher rank.

But the prince was also gloved; and when he had performed that somewhat tedious operation of ungloving, there arrived on the scene another prince, who happened to be of the elder branch.

So the unfortunate king had to wait once more, and as the room was cold, it is recorded that he took a violent chill.

At King Louis's dinner, when the cook brought in the meat for the royal plate, he was attended by armed soldiers and preceded by a herald, shouting "Gentlemen, the King's viands!" Whereupon the company all uncovered, and the sentinels saluted the roast chicken or the royal mutton cutlets.

When the king was about to drink, a chamberlain announced the fact at the top of his voice, and two functionaries, whose duty it was to taste the wine or water in order to prove that it had not been poisoned, stepped forward, poured out a little, and drank it off. Then the king drank.

The great mass of royal formalities and points of etiquette disappeared with the last century, but the rules of precedence are still very strictly observed in royal courts.—Exchange.

THANKFUL MOTHERS

Mrs. Willie Theriault, Pacquetville, N. B., says: "I am extremely thankful that I tried Baby's Own Tablets for my baby. Through their use baby thrived wonderfully, and I feel as if I cannot recommend them too highly." Baby's Own Tablets break up colds and simple fevers; cure constipation, colic and indigestion, and make teething easy. In fact, they cure all the minor ills of little ones. They are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Preserve Eggs Now

The indications are that eggs will be dear next winter, dearer than they were last winter, so those who want eggs had better put some down now, while they are comparatively cheap. Do not use oats, bran, salt or such mediums; moreover, the patent preservatives usually advertised as being so simple and effective had better be adopted with caution. Better use something that has been tried and found satisfactory.

According to Dr. Frank T. Shutt, Dominion Chemist, lime water is one of the best preservatives; and we quote the following from his Exhibition Circular No. 43.

The method of preparation is simply to slake one pound good quick lime with a small quantity of water, and then stir the milk of lime so formed into five gallons of water. After the mixture has been kept well stirred for a few hours, it is allowed to settle. The supernatant liquid, which is now "saturated" limewater, is drawn off and poured over the eggs, previously placed in a crock or water-tight barrel.

As exposure to the air tends to precipitate the lime (as carbonate), and thus to weaken the solution, the vessel containing the eggs should be kept covered. The air may be excluded by a covering of sweet oil, or by sacking upon which a paste of lime is spread. If, after a time, there is any noticeable precipitation of the lime, the limewater should be drawn or siphoned off, and replaced with a further quantity newly prepared.

GENERAL PRECAUTIONS NECESSARY TO TAKE.

It is essential that attention be paid to the following points:

1. That perfectly fresh eggs only be used.

2. That the eggs should throughout the whole period of preservation be completely immersed.

Although not necessary to the preservation of the eggs in a sound condition, a temperature of 40 degrees F. to 45 degrees F. will no doubt materially assist towards retaining good flavor, or rather in arresting that "stale" flavor so often characteristic of packed eggs.

Respecting the addition of salt, it must be stated that our experiments—conducted now throughout fifteen seasons—do not show any benefit to be derived therefrom; indeed, salt frequently imparts a limey flavor to the egg, probably by inducing an interchange of the fluids within and without the egg. Our advice is, do not add any salt to the lime-water.

CUTICURA HEALS ITCHY SCALP RASH

That Burned and Pained Four Years. Hair Came Out. Loss of Sleep.

"My scalp was red and very itchy, and a fine rash developed which burned and pained incessantly. This seemed to destroy the hair roots, causing my hair to come out, which disfigured the top of my head. It also caused loss of sleep.

"The trouble lasted four years. Then I sent for a free sample of Cuticura Soap and Ointment which encouraged me so I bought more, and I had one cake of Cuticura Soap and one box of Ointment and I was healed." (Signed) John Cunningham, Church St., Antigonish, N.S., April 4, 1917.

WALLOON AND FLEMING.

The report coming from Amsterdam to the effect that the German Governor-General of Belgium is to divide that country's Ministries of Agriculture, Industry, Art and Science and Labor into Flemish and Walloon ministries elicited from the United States National Geographic Society the following defining territories in the two districts:

"In point of population the Walloon district of Belgium is considerably smaller than the Flemish, the latest census showing some 3,000,000 Walloons and 4,000,000 Flemings, but in area the Walloons have a slight advantage. The advantage in population grows out of the fact that three of the four cities of the kingdom which boast of more than 100,000 inhabitants—Brussels, Antwerp and Ghent—are in Flemish territory, while Liege alone lies south of the roughly drawn imaginary boundary line running in a southwesterly direction from Aix-la-Chapelle (German, Aachen) to Lille.

"The term Walloons is used to designate those Belgians who speak French or a French dialect, while the Flemings are those who speak Dutch or a Dutch dialect. Designated as provinces, the Walloons are in the main confined to Hainaut, Namur, Liege, Luxenberg and a part of Brabant, comprising an area about five times as large as the State of Rhode Island, while Flemish territory approximates the area of the State of Connecticut.

"In the veins of the Walloons runs a strain of Celtic blood, for they are the descendants of the Belgae of Julius Caesar's day. They exchanged their own language for that of the Latins.

"During the fierce religious conflicts of the sixteenth century the Walloons as a rule sided with the Spaniards and won the epithet of 'The Malcontents.' In fact, they furnished the Catholic monarch with many of his mercenaries during the days when the Duke of Alva, Don John of Austria and Grand Commander Requesens were endeavoring to put down revolt in the Low Countries.

"The Walloons are generally accredited with more vivacity and nervous energy than their Flemish countrymen, and in a country where industry and thrift are universal characteristics a comparison which awards the palm for these virtues to the Walloons is perhaps not odious. Among the lower classes, however, the Flemings are said to excel their brunette compatriots in personal neatness.

"Among the most distinguished Walloon men of letters in the middle ages was the famous chronicler Froissart."

Walrus of Alaska.

The Alaska walrus are enormous. The average one is as big as an ox, and it often weighs more than a ton. A walrus was recently killed by some whalers near Point Barrow, whose head weighed eighty pounds, and skin, including flippers, 600 pounds. That animal had a girth of fourteen feet, and its weight was over 2,000 pounds. The skin was from half an inch to three inches in thickness, and the blubber weighed 500 pounds.

THE BABY LIONS.

(Sung to the tune of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic.")

The Lion Cubs are coming from their homes across the sea,
For the Mother Lion calls them on a trip to Germany;
They're going to see the Kaiser, do you think it's glad he'll be,
When the Baby Lions come?

Chorus:
Growling like the distant thunder,
German hordes they'll rend asunder,
Making them disgorge their plunder,
When the Baby Lions come.

Canada responded with a roar across the world,
Australia and New Zealand too their battle flags unfurled,
India, South Africa, the Islands of the Sea,
They all come marching on.

All the highways of creation see them speeding to the fight,
To help the Mother Lion, in her battle for the right;
The Kaiser and his vandals they will surely see the light,
When the Baby Lions come.

They've left their sun kissed deserts and their distant fields of ice,
They've left their maple sugar, kangaroos and crops of rice,
Quite expensive, but the Prussians will most likely pay the price,
When the Baby Lions come.

They are looking very brawly, very strong, and very fit,
And their souls are filled with burning that the flames of Flanders lit;
Kaiser Bill will find he can't chew up the mouthful he has bit,
When the Baby Lions come.

Yes, the Lion Family's coming, not a member of it wanes,
To the rescue of a dainty Belgian maid that's bound in chains,
And if need be they will pour out every drop within their veins,
When the Baby Lions come.

GET BACK TO NATURE.

Live the Simple Life and Win Health and Happiness.

The movement to return to nature and simple life is the solution offered to the high cost of living problem, but health experts and enthusiasts have found it to be the only way of right living or healthful living known to-day. They have accepted it as a safe road to health. They say that a return to nature means good digestion, sound sleep, a clear head, a clean mind, contentment and joy to be alive.

But further, they say, it means getting close to nature—living out of doors as much as possible by working, playing and resting in the open air and, above all, by sleeping in the open air. "Outdoor sleeping is the best life preserver known." It means also going to the garden and orchard for your bill of fare—tomatoes, lettuce, celery, spinach, turnips, beans, corn, peas, melons, berries, apples, peaches, plums and all other fruits and green stuffs untouched by fire.

The real value of adopting the simple life, according to the health experts, lies in the pleasure we find in living it. To do it grudgingly or without knowing and appreciating its benefits we botch it and fail, but to love health more than appetite and seek it is to have health, comfort, efficiency and a long life. "Start the simple life—begin it to-day," is the motto of this health movement.—North Carolina State Board of Health Bulletin.

Couldn't Stand Defeat.

Dr. Grenfell tells an amusing story of the introduction of football in Labrador, when defeat was considered so unendurable a mortification that it had to be mutually agreed beforehand that neither side should win. "We saw," he says, "that unusual spectacle of the side that had been scored against solemnly allowed to walk across the field and kick a goal to save them the feeling of being beaten."

Old Time London Ruffians.

At the beginning of the eighteenth century a number of ruffianly young men of the higher classes—called by Swift "a race of rakes that play the devil about the town every night"—known as "Mohocks," infested London, sallying out drunk in the streets, carrying short clubs loaded with lead at both ends and perpetrating shameful cruelties upon peaceful passersby, wantonly wounding and disfiguring the men and subjecting all alike to atrocious insults. Lecky says that matrons inclosed in barrels were rolled down the steep and stony Snow Hill. Watchmen were unmercifully beaten, and their noses were slit. Coaches and chairs were overturned on rubbish heaps, and country gentlemen visiting the theaters had to be accompanied by their armed retainers as if in time of war.—Pearson's Weekly.

GERMANS FEAR NORSE ENMITY

Think Country May Unite With Entente.

Warn Denmark May Seize Naval Base.

A Copenhagen cable: Behind the meeting of the Scandinavian monarchs and Ministers at Christiania this week lies the fear, unfounded though it may be, of Norway's entry into the war and of the German menace that, in this case, she should feel called upon to occupy Denmark as a counter-measure.

The Associated Press learns from a responsible source that the conference, which was arranged in consequence of an intimation from Germany that the growth of anti-German sentiment in Norway, particularly after the sinking of the convoy in the North Sea by German cruisers, is being followed with concern by Germany, and that it is expected that Norway might be impelled, either by public opinion or pressure from the allied side, to enter the struggle at least to the point of granting a naval base to England and the United States, in which event Germany would feel called upon to seize a corresponding base in Denmark.

Upon the receipt of this conclusion at Copenhagen word was hurriedly sent to King Gustave of Sweden, and Denmark's most prominent citizen, President, Andersen, of the Danish East Asiatic Company, who is high in the confidence of Berlin, as well as London, was despatched to Berlin to verify the report, and if possible to change the German attitude. Mr. Andersen conferred with Dr. von Kuehlmann, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, at Berlin, and he confirmed the report, adding that since the Italian and Russian developments the military and Pan-German elements were again in the saddle in Germany and exerting influence against which the foreign office, with more moderate views, found it most difficult to contend.

King Gustave came to Copenhagen and spent a day in conference with King Christian, President Andersen and the Danish Ministers, the subject matter of the conferences being covered by a display of gala performances, an opera ballet, ceremonial banquet and the conventional interchange of speeches. As a result of the conference a decision was reached to make every possible effort to moderate the excited Norwegian sentiment and continue the three Scandinavian countries in the path of joint neutrality.

King Gustave returned to Stockholm and launched the suggestion of a conference of the three kings, accompanied by Premiers and Foreign Ministers, at Christiania, which will be accepted, the Norwegians being flattered with the thought of the first visit from a Swedish monarch in the Norwegian capital since the separation of the two countries.

THREE DANGERS FACE RUSSIANS

Still Seek to Fraternize With Foe Under Fire.

Bolsheviki Are Distrustful of Huns.

A Petrograd cable: Efforts of Russian soldiers to fraternize with the Germans, despite the German commanders' orders to the contrary, are meeting with considerable success; the German officers, apparently unable to keep their soldiers in the trenches from fraternizing with the Russians, are carrying on an artillery duel, but the fraternizing takes place under shell fire. This persistence shows the earnestness of the Russian propagandists, many of whom are being killed in the cause. Their positions are made doubly difficult because of the shortage of food. Less eager revolutionary soldiers are not grasping the crusading spirit and are turning rearward, occupying the railroad facilities and making it difficult to provide the front lines. So over vast stretches of the front the others must continue to fraternize, if at all under threat of German fire before them and hunger in the rear. The fact that so many are remaining to press the German soldiers to revolt shows the vitality of the revolutionary spirit.

Meanwhile the power of the new Government is concentrating. All the regiments in Petrograd are now behind it, having voted support at a united meeting. The trouble also is much stronger than it was. A week ago English and American exchange commanded almost any price; now the situation is changed and Russian business men are taking new courage in the hope of avoiding civil war.

THREE DANGER POINTS.

The three remaining danger points are:

First—A possible serious shortage of food, particularly at the front.

Second—A possible tragedy if the Russian soldiers begin leaving the front in large numbers.

Third—The effect on the allies of the attempt to bring about an armistice.

But while a tragedy impends the country is having time to readjust itself. The publication of the diplomatic correspondence has been finished, and the Bolsheviki leaders believe it has made a great impression outside of Russia.

The Vetchera, formerly the Vetchernaya Vremya, commenting on the statement made by the allied military mission to Gen. Dukhonin, former commander-in-chief of the Russian army, who recently was deposed for refusing to obey the order to open armistice negotiations with the Germans, that any break in the London agreement by Russia would bring serious consequences, declares that the threat is not only a form of speech, but exists and is a terrible one.

"From the moment the allies break off relations," says the newspaper, "the transport will cease, as it already has ceased from the United States, and all the frontiers of our late allies will be closed to us."

The newspaper says it has been declared that Russia cannot exist during the coming year without imports, and concludes ironically, as follows:

"Even 'friendly' Germany will not be in a position to supply us with necessities."

The Vetchera admits the impossibility of Russia carrying on the war, but says Russia should be so conducted as not to needlessly offend the allies.

Sunday next has been set by the Germans as the date for a conference with the Bolsheviki leaders with the purpose of negotiating an armistice.

While the negotiations are expected to embrace an armistice "on all the fronts of the belligerent countries, it is certain that the Entente allies will give no heed to the overtures, either of the Bolsheviki, who comprise the Radical section of the Russians, who long have desired Russia to cease fighting, or of the Germans, who for even a greater period of time, have been endeavoring to put into operation negotiations for a peace that would prove a suitable one for themselves and their allies.

That the Bolsheviki leaders are distrustful of the Germans, although they have agreed to enter into negotiations for an armistice, is apparent from the fact that Ensign Krylenko, the Bolsheviki commander-in-chief, has ordered, pending the conference, there shall be no fraternizing on the part of the Russians with the Germans, and advised vigilance and caution by the troops.

The diplomatic representatives of the neutral countries, after a conference, decided to reply to Leon Trotzky's notification respecting an armistice as a matter of courtesy, as they would reply to the representations of a private individual. They affirm, however, that their action must not be taken as recognition.

The allied embassies are maintaining a waiting attitude pending the meeting of the Constituent Assembly.

Count Czernin, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, in a discussion with the delegates of the Upper House, said, according to a Vienna despatch to-day, that Austria was ready to enter into negotiations with Russia for an honorable and acceptable peace.

TO HARRY HUNS ENTIRE WINTER

Foe Will Get No Rest On the Western Front.

Great Encircling Movement Under Way.

A Washington, D. C., report: The British drive on Cambrai will be followed up relentlessly by similar offensives along the western front, in the opinion of officers familiar with what is in prospect in France. Authoritative announcement already has been made abroad that this winter would see no halt in operations, and, with the return of the American divisional commanders from observation tours in France, it has become certain that the French and British armies will prosecute midwinter campaigns such as never before attempted.

Secretary of War Baker said today that the returning officers would proceed to their divisional camps and resume the personal direction of the training of their men. From these officers it is expected that officials will get graphic reports of the preparations being made for the continuous winter offensive against the Germans. Already the allied troops have forced their way forward against more serious obstacles than they will encounter later when the cold has hardened the ground for the passage of troops and artillery. The mud of Flanders has been the greatest barrier to major operations during the last few weeks, but the Cambrai attack was forced home despite it.

Meagre official reports of the progress of the drive on Cambrai indicate clearly that General Byng's forces are closing, at a great encircling movement. With a wedge driven into the Cambrai front the British commander apparently is working his way behind the German lines on his left flank. If he succeeds in penetrating deeply in that direction, many officers here believe he will force a retirement by the Germans on a wide front.

Meanwhile the British and French pressure further toward the Belgian coast is increasing. A new offensive effort there is expected as a part of the whole plan on which the allies are engaged in forcing the Germans back from along the section of the coast where submarine bases are located. The Cambrai successes have an important bearing, in the opinion of officers here, on this general plan of accomplishing during the winter a decisive result in the coastal region on the foundation upon which next year's offensive campaign can be laid.

Italy Feels the Menace is Waning as Ally Aid Comes.

A Rome report: The reports from the Italian line on the northern front were favorable to-day. The heavy fighting is continuing, with the Italians holding in the main.

Terrible blizzards sweeping over the mountains in the north came to the aid of the Italians in holding back the invading Austrians. A heavy fall of snow forced the enemy to delay moving up heavy artillery and made movement of his reinforcements practically impossible.

From the Asiago plateau to the Piave the enemy has suffered appalling losses without gaining any advantage. Between the Piave and the Brenta the enemy has already worn out six divisions. The 21st Landsturm, during an action near Monte Fior fought from the evening until dawn against other Austro-German troops, which were decimated.

ITALIAN OFFICIAL REPORT.

Tuesday's Italian War Office statement follows:

"Yesterday afternoon the enemy, after bombarding furiously our position on Col Della Berretta, to the east of the Brenta Valley, launched against it a massed attack to an entire division of infantry. The ensuing struggle was very fierce, and the defenders, isolated by a violent barrage fire, would perhaps have been compelled to give way in view of the size of the attacking force and the violence of its assault, had not their support, composed of splendid Sicilians of the ancient and glorious Aosta brigade, with parties of the 24th Infantry and the Brenta Valley Battalion of Alpini, arrived in time.

"Having crossed the death zone with elan, our gallant troops rushed against the enemy with irresistible impetus, carrying all before them and compelling him to retire with very severe losses, leaving prisoners in our hands."

MADE FINE ATTACKS.

Italian Army Headquarters cable: Five determined attacks by Austro-German forces on the left wing of the Italian Fourth army, near Monte Pertica, between the Brenta and the Piave, were delivered yesterday. The enemy rushes were broken by the defensive troops with heavy losses to the attackers.

Not only the left, but the right wing and the centre of the army holding this sector was subjected to attack, the enemy effort now attaining its full force here. On the right and centre the struggle raged from Montefara, westward, with the Italians holding their lines at all points.

The fluctuations of the great battle have now developed to a stage where the resisting power of the Italian army has been demonstrated to be sufficient to retard, if not to prevent any sudden rush through the passes leading to the Venetian plains. This was regarded as a serious menace six days ago, but as each day has shown the Italian lines holding solid against repeated attacks and their defenders ready even to take the aggressive against heavy odds, the feeling of gravity that then prevailed is changing to one of restored confidence and unwavering determination, coupled with a spirit of buoyancy which pervades all ranks of the army and civilian life.

There is also the feeling that friendly allied support is near at a timely moment and that the mingled ranks of grey, blue and khaki will combine to form the barrier that Italy has sustained alone until now.

Many British officers were at headquarters to-day and the streets showed almost as much khaki as grey. The Prince of Wales renewed his earlier visit, going about the streets and mingling with the officers at public restaurants in the most democratic fashion.

It is reported from the Friuli region occupied by the enemy, that the civil population has been required to turn over all copper articles, grease and oils in its possession within five days. Emperor Charles is said to have made another visit to the invaded region, going to the coast cities of Grado and Monfalcone.

GERMAN AGENTS BUSY IN RUSSIA

A Washington report: German propaganda in Russia is increasing in intensity, according to information received at the Embassy here from the Russian Ambassadors at Paris and Rome.

Every effort, they reported, is being made to misrepresent the attitude of the Entente powers and that of the United States, and misleading announcements of policy are being spread in Russia and in other countries.

FLOUR BUYER FOR BRITAIN.

Winnipeg Report.—Geo. H. Kelly has just been appointed as flour-buyer for the British Government in Western Canada, operating through the Wheat Export Company. Mr. Kelly will be located in the offices of the Wheat Export Company, in Winnipeg, and will do all the buying of flour for Britain and her allies from the Great Lakes west to the Pacific Coast.

CRISIS UPON THE ITALIAN FRONT ENDED

Gen. Maurice Says the Menace Has Passed in That Zone.

CAMBRIA FIGHT

Still in Melting Pot—Another Battle Soon in Palestine.

A London cable says: Major-General F. B. Maurice, chief director of military operations in the War Office, reviewing our war situation to-day, said:

"Our troops are now in sight of Jerusalem, but the Turks have had time to get up reserves and make a stand, but it is probable that Jerusalem will not fall without another definite battle.

"The meaning of the recent lull on the Palestine front is that we must get up fresh troops, guns, supplies and munitions for that battle."

The passing of the crisis on the Italian front, General Maurice said, was due entirely to the efforts of the Italian army, adding: "Anglo-French troops are now available in sufficient quantities to satisfy us that the situation is secure."

General Maurice pointed out that German hostility to exploit the Italian disaster could be regarded as significant of Austro-German weakness.

"The results which the Germans attained in their first attack," he said, "were due solely to the successful propaganda among the ignorant soldiers of the uneducated peasant class.

"This success far exceeded any German expectations. But, having gained this success, it would be expected that the Germans would do all possible to exploit it. They have been able to do nothing beyond following up the Italian retirement. Even now there is no sign anywhere of the vast German reinforcements which it might naturally be expected Germany would rush up to strike a decisive blow at the enemy. Why? My only answer is they are not there because Germany is unable to send them. She is unable to exploit the opportunity offered."

Of the western front he said: "The Battle of Cambrai is still in the melting-pot. The attack was a great success. The British in this case had no definite objectives. We intended to get as far as we could, and I can tell you we established ourselves a deal further than Field Marshal Haig expected.

"The actual positions captured were very intricate, showing the tremendous element of work put in on the triple Hindenburg line by the German soldiers. Each line was defended by strong trenches, dugouts, tunnels and a triple line of barbed wire, each line fifty to sixty yards in depth. The villages behind the line had beneath them great chambers, which it would be slander to call dugouts; they were more like hotels fifty feet beneath the ground and were provided with electricity, water supply, sewers, drying rooms and kitchens. All the earth excavated from these places had been deposited inside the houses, so from aeroplanes the villages appeared always perfectly normal. These underground villages were absolutely shell-proof and bomb-proof."

Gen. Maurice declared that the British position in the Cambrai salient was one which would be of the greatest service in further operations against the Germans. He continued: "The Cambral attack resulted in our capture of just under 11,000 prisoners, more than a hundred guns and between sixty and seventy square miles of territory. The enemy was forced to use many more of its divisions."

General Maurice said there had been no important movement of German troops from the Russian front.

POPE REPLIES TO HIS CRITICS

Not Seeking an Unsatisfactory Peace Pact,

Or Making a New Appeal at Present.

A Rome cable: The Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri, answering the numerous criticisms regarding the Vatican's peace attitude, issued to the press to-day the following statement: "The Holy Father is not preparing any new appeal looking toward peace. His earnest desire, many times manifested, for a just, Christian and durable peace, is unchanged and cannot change. Who can crave anything else and call himself a Christian?"

"To say that his holiness favors, or has favored, or will favor an unjust, un-Christian and unendurable peace is not only false, but also absurd. Any propaganda for such a peace, alleged to be conducted at the Vatican's inspiration, especially in certain nations, is the product of pure maliciousness. A chain of prayers has always been reprobated by the Holy See, and bishops and priests in the United States and elsewhere are warned against them, particularly those having any such propaganda behind them.

"Also, American Catholics and others are cautioned that such prayers are a species of superstition.

"The Catholic Church has always regarded true patriotism as a Christian duty and a Christian virtue, and still so teaches. The fact that the Italian Parliament has had warm eulogy for the clergy should be sufficient to refute the calumnies which irresponsible persons have circulated and are circulating in the foreign world.

"Malicious insinuations propagated in America, and the tendency to attribute in great part to the Italian clergy responsibility for the recent situation must be denounced.

"In Italy no fair-minded person is attributing the situation to the clergy.

"When the disruptive propaganda began to affect the morale of the Italian army, the clergy in general, and also the army chaplains, following the instructions and example of the chaplain-in-chief, labored to counteract it and elevate the morale of the troops. More than once the army chaplains informed the chaplain-in-chief, who informed the supreme civil authorities of the disruptive movement that was creeping in, and all that long before the publication of the Papal note."

HOW HUNS BURN SHIPS

Enemy's Modus Operandi in America Known.

Boston report: An innocent-looking white liquid, timed to burst into flame by the strength or weakness of the solution, has been the source of fires with which American shipping has been menaced ever since the war began, according to Arthur Woods, Police Commissioner, of New York, who delivered an address here last night.

The chemical, Mr. Woods said, was the cause of ruinous fires aboard sugar ships at sea some months ago. "For a long time," he said, "we could not find out how the inflammable material which caused the fires was put aboard ship. But we think we have it now—at least no more ships are being burned. eW discovered a kind of stuff that bursts into flame after a period of time that may be closely calculated according to the strength of the solution when it is placed on a cloth and left reasonably exposed to air.

NO DEALINGS WITH LENINE

Inter-Allied Conference to Consider Russia.

Present Rulers Not True Representatives.

A Paris cable: There will emerge from the Inter-Allied Conference, unless present plans go away, a definite understanding as to the policy to be pursued by allied diplomacy at Petrograd.

In the last few days I have talked with several high authorities on this subject, and all are agreed that one of the most important problems which representatives of the Entente Governments and the United States must tackle is the establishment of a unity of diplomatic action toward Russia.

While the other allied powers will not seek to disguise the absence of anything resembling a properly-constituted Government in Russia, there is no tendency to regard the Russians, as a nation, as unworthy of further consideration.

On the other hand, I have the best reasons for believing the allied conferences will refuse to treat with the Leninists on any terms, for to do so would be to seem to recognize their right to speak for the Russian people—an impossible hypothesis. For the present the first thing to attain is a uniformity of action among the Ambassadors from the United States, Great Britain, France and Italy at Petrograd.

WILL WORK WITHOUT SALARY.

Detroit, Report—F. H. McPherson, former [illegible] of Windsor, but for the past few years engaged in business in Detroit, was to-day appointed to direct the work of the division of investigation of the War Industries Board at Washington. The appointment was wholly unsolicited. Mr. MacPherson, in accepting his new position, is influenced entirely by patriotic motives, as the position carries no salary.

STILL HOLDING THE AUSTRIANS

Italians Continue to Guard the Venetian Plain.

Would Not Trust Foe With Armistice.

A London cable says: The Italians continue to hold tenaciously to their northern front between the Brenta and Piave Rivers against the Austro-German forces, who have been unable in repeated attacks to gain additional terrain.

From a staff officer of the 4th army, on the line between the Brenta and Piave Rivers, it was learned also that the enemy had asked for an armistice to bury his dead, the request being refused by the Italians because of the Austrian attitude on a similar request a few months ago. The Austrians had then proposed that during the armistice the Italian guards should be unarmed and the Austrian guards armed.

Wednesday's War Office report said:

"On the Asiago plateau, in the Primolano basin, at the north of Col. Della Berretta, and on the Middle Piave, our batteries, in co-operation with bombardment flights, have carried out concentrations of fire on enemy troops massed and in movement. Four enemy aeroplanes were brought down yesterday by our airmen."

FLIERS AGAIN BUSY

Doing Good Work Against Huns in Flanders.

London, Cable.—The official communication issued this evening dealing with aviation says:

"The weather Monday was slightly better for flying, but low clouds and a strong wind again hindered work in the air. Some successful artillery work was done by our aeroplanes, and many photographs were taken.

"Enemy troops, batteries and transports were constantly attacked by our low-flying machines. During the day bombs were dropped on the crossings over the River Zensee and the railheads near Cambrai, and north of Douai. At night the Douai station was attacked. Bombs also were dropped on the Somain Station and sidings. In all, over three tons of bombs were dropped.

"A few fights in the air occurred, in which one hostile machine was downed and four were driven down out of control. Another hostile machine was shot by our fire from the ground. None of our machines is missing."

BANDITS CAUGHT.

Auto Gang at Toledo, Nabbed, Booty Recovered.

Toledo, O., Report.—The police this afternoon announced the capture of the six bandits who held up the Huebner Brewery Company bookkeeper to-day and got away with [illegible].

The police also announced the recovery of all the stolen money. In addition to the six men, a 29-year old girl, Wanda [illegible], is under arrest. She was employed as telephone girl in the Huebner brewery office. Her brother is one of the alleged bandits under arrest.

Police pursued the bandits into Michigan, and there made the captures. A deputy sheriff and farmer captured two of the men in a field near Erie, Michigan. Fred Grudzinski, 21, of Toledo, was wounded. Frank Newman, 29, of Cleveland, a Canadian soldier on a furlough, was with him. Each carried $20 in gold. Both are reported to have confessed and said the robbery was planned six months ago.

GERMANS READY TO NEGOTIATE

A Petrograd cable: Representatives sent by Krylenko, the Bolsheviki commander-in-chief of the Russian armies, have been received in the German lines, and informed by the German commander that the Germans have officially consented to immediate negotiations for an armistice on all the fronts of the belligerent countries.

TEUTONS LOST.

Attack On Italians in Albania Costly Failure.

A Rome cable: Austrian troops made another attack on the Italian lines in Albania on Sunday, in which they scored an initial success, the War Office announced to-day. Reinforcements came to the assistance of the Albanian bands that had been driven back in the region southeast of Berat, and the Austrians were forced to retreat with heavy casualties.

"The text of the statement reads: "In Albania on Sunday night the enemy forced a passage on the Osum River between Cipan and Kodkara, southeast of Berat, attacking our Albanian bands there. The prompt intervention of regular troops drove the enemy back with the infliction of heavy losses upon him."

WANTS "REDS" FREED.

Trotzky Demands Release by Great Britain.

London Cable.—A Reuter despatch from Petrograd says that Leon Trotzky, Bolsheviki Foreign Minister, has written to Sir George W. Buchanan, British Ambassador, demanding the release of two Russian citizens, Chicherin and Petroff by name, under arrest in England, characterizing them as "staunch and selfsacrificing men of high ideals." He demands also the release of others under arrest.

Trotzky alleges that many Englishmen living in Russia are openly engaged in political activities with the counter-revolutionary Russian Bourgeoisie.

W. C. T. U. Ladies Ask Council for a Curfew

Mrs. Hugh McLaren and Mrs. Vanalyke visited the council on Friday night and asked the council to have a curfew bell rung at 9 o'clock each evening. The ladies pointed out that there were too many young children allowed to roam the streets at night, and suggested the curfew, the parents seeming to have no control.

They also pointed out that gum boxes on the street on Sunday were responsible for children spending their pennies for gum, which should properly go to Sunday school collection.

Reeve Izzard and the council promised to consider the requests, the reeve said that he was quite favorably disposed to both suggestions. He thought the town should have a bell, and if all citizens would concern themselves it would be quite easy to get a bell and place it in a proper tower.

Name of Candidate	X
Name of Candidate

The Times has been asked by a lady reader to print a ballot and show women what to do. The above is the form used. In the spaces will be the names of Mr. Clark and Mr. MacAulay, the candidates. Whichever gentleman you want to vote for put a X in the small block opposite his name. The procedure is:—Go to the polling booth give your name. The poll clerk will check it off, and the deputy returning officer will give you a ballot. Go behind the curtain, you'll find a table there with a pencil on it. You will be alone. Take a moment to think, then place a X on your ballot, opposite the man you desire to vote for, then fold your ballot again bring it out to the deputy returning officer pause a moment and see that he places it in the ballot box, then you are finished and your ballot is secret.

Don't put more than one cross on your ballot.

Don't put it anywhere else but in the block opposite the man you want to vote for.

Don't write on, or mar your ballot in any way, that will spoil it.

Don't under any circumstances write your name on your ballot. That spoils it, and besides, the officials will know how you voted.

Also, if you are a wise woman, you will tell no one how you voted.

Bruce County Council Sets Aside $5,000 for Local Red Cross

Warden Izzard addressed the local Red Cross ladies on Friday afternoon when he told them that as a result of representations made by Red Cross ladies the council had considered setting aside $5000 out of the $100.000 which the county gives to Patriotic work. This $5000 to be used for the Red Cross societies of the county

The manner of giving out these funds is by the local Red Cross ladies sending in to the reeve of the municipality the accounts of the goods or materials they have purchased during the month and when certified to by the reeve and forwarded to the county treasurer, they will receive back dollar for dollar.

The Warden was applauded by the ladies, and before leaving the room he left with the president a neat gift, a part of his sessional indemnity while at county council.

Tribunal Finishes

Port Elgin Tribunal finished all its cases last week. The decisions are as follows:

Allowed—Alex. Campbell, W. Faust, E. Miller, James Scott, G. Lovell D. Thomson, J. H. Bricker, Geo. Campbell, R. Trelford (class C), Norman Smith, Alfred Miller, W. G. Nicholson, J. Hodge, S. Meadowah, E. Faust.

Disallowed—W. J. Campbell, C. Ickler, Darcy Cameron, E. Williams, G. Hepner, W. Goodall, Harvey Hopper, Francis Stanley.

Miss Winnie Struthers is home from Toronto.

The storm has blocked the roads so that Times correspondence is delayed this week.

Advertise it in The Times.

Warden Izzard is Good Roads Supt.

At the meeting of the County Council last week, Warden. D. J. Izzard was unanimously requested to take up the work of Mr. William Hunter, the Good Roads Superintendent, who has resigned.

Mr. Hunter finds his business demands all his time, and as the work must go on Mr. Izzard has been pressed into service. He has accepted the task and begins work January 1st. The salary is $1500, $900 of which is paid by the county and $600 by the government.

Mr. Izzard will at once begin to organize the county, securing a good man in each district to look after good roads. These men must be outside local or County councils.

The county is fortunate in securing Mr. Izzard. He is well qualified for the task, and will no doubt organize the county to a high state of efficiency.

TOWN COUNCIL

The reeve and all members of the council were present at the council meeting Friday night.

The business tax of Smith Bros, of $7 was refunded. Mr. Gus Smith showing that no business had been transacted. Miss Struthers was refunded $1.75 on income tax.

A by law was put through for the borrowing of $1000 at 6 per cent for Red Cross purposes. The treasurer reported that he had sent away to British Red Cross $2762.97.

A by-law was also passed providing for the holding of the municipal elections. Mr. D. Geddes and R. M. Lowry were appointed for the poll at the town hall, and Mr. James Struthers and George Chapman for the poll at McLachlan's shop.

The rates for water at the Stevens-Hepner Co's works were set for this year (1917) at $300. This figures out at about seven cents per thousand gallons.

Council meets again on Saturday.

Walks Twelve Miles To See Tribunal

Percy Willard Cameron, an Indian, walked 12 miles from Scotch Settlement to appear before Port Elgin Tribunal Wednesday morning.

During the examination the military representative asked if he was well He said he was, excepting a little pain, and pointed to the region of his stomach. Further inquiry revealed the fact that Percy had got up and finished the twelve miles before breakfast. Asked if he had any cash he said he had five cents. The Tribunal had the privilege of seeing that Percy had enough to eat. After intimating that boys in the army had good meals Percy said he wouldn't mind going to war, and he was sent to Harriston for examination. The lad asked how many miles it was to Harriston, and when told it was 50 miles, he replied: "I do not think I can walk it to day."

Percy went away quite happy with his railway ticket and some loose change. Next day he walked another 24 miles to the Tribunal and back, where he was made a good soldier.

WHOM IS HE FOOLING?

Mr. MacCaulay must be fooling someone? If he really intends to support the Union Government he is fooling C. M. Bowman, M. P. P., and other Laurierites.

He is not fooling them. Every vote cast for him is a vote against Union Government. He was nominated to support Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and every Laurierite in Bruce is supporting him,

He has been officially endorsed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier who is not endorsing Unionists if he knows it He has not yet repudiated that endorsement.

[Advertisement]

THIS IS THE TEST

"Votes for Union Government should be given to candidates approved by it."—Toronto Globe.

The candidate approved by the Union Government in North Bruce is Hugh Clark. The candidate approved of by Sir Wilfrid Laurier is John McAuley.

It is quite safe to doubt either the sense or the sincerity of the man who says he is against Laurier but is voting for McAuley.

[Advertisement]

KEEP YOUR EYE ON THEM

There are Liberals in North Bruce who urged men to enlist in the 160th. They favored conscription and said so.

To day some of them are supporting a candidate approved of by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who will suspend the Military Service Act until a referendum is had on it.

For the sake of party politics these men will delay if not entirely prevent sending reinforcements to the men they induced to go to the front

Their sincerity and patriotism is being put to the acid test. They delude no one (not even themselves) by pretending that Mr. McAuley will support the Union Government. They know better. Some of them would not support him if they really believed it.

BURGOYNE AND DISTRICT

Victory Loan, hog boosters, franchise agents etc., have been doing the district the last few weeks, and in addition to that we are wondering what will be the next scheme to keep the printing and drawing agencies in good service till after the 17th. And of course we're wondering how many thousands of the peoples dollars have gone in payments to these agencies during the past 12 months and as we talk and gossip, one with another, about such things as, the piles and piles of good money spent, to our mind, without apparent cause. In silly and irritating ad's covering whole pages of our family dailies and weeklies, farm magazines and every other kind. It's disgusting. Why some of our old veterans even frown at the "Globe" and pitch it aside unread. Not that we are unpatriotic or disloyal but we just can't help wondering what will be done with what is left of the three hundred million.

Mr. R. D. Northgrave Has Important Appointment

On Thursday R. D. Northgrave received a special appointment from the Minister of Agriculture, the import of it being that he will have the whole territory of West Bruce, to look after all farmers and farmers sons and see that none are taken off the farms by the Tribunals,

His duties are quite clear, and it would seem that no farmer or farmer's son is to be taken from the farm. Mr. Northgrave is given complete control of the situation and will make recommendations in all cases which are brought to him by the farmers, According to the instructions in the following telegram it would seem to be the proper course for farmers to take their cases at once to Mr. Northgrave.

Following is the telgram:

Ottawa, Dec. 8, 1917

R. D. Northgrave, Esq.,
Port Elgin, Ont.

It has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture that in some cases tribunals appointed under Military Service Act have selected farmers sons and men employed as help on the farms, whose services could not be spared and would be the means of causing a reduction in the production of food stuffs

In order that such results might not happen and as a protection to Agriculture, the minister has selected you to represent the Department of Agriculture and look into such cases in Bruce and take up same and communicate with the district military representative, military headquarters, London, and report to such military officers your objections and reasons why such person so selected should be relieved from Military Service in order that he may remain on the farm.

Geo. F. O'halloran,
Deputy Minister of Agriculture

Attend the public meeting in Mr. MacAulay's interests in the town hall on Friday night. Everybody welcome.

Many towns and cities have sent relief to Halifax sufferers. Should not this district do something to assist the stricken people?

"EVERY INCH A MAN"

JOHN MACAULAY
Independent Liberal Candidate for North Bruce

A Southampton boy, a Wiarton citizen, whom you all know, respectfully asks for your vote next Monday. A better type of a Canadian citizen, a man with a bigger heart, or more sterling character, is hard to find. Everyone has the glad hand for "Jack MacAulay." After he had received the nomination a former prominent Conservative in this district wrote, congratulated him and said "if I were in North Bruce I could not vote against you." If you know John MacAulay you will probably vote for him, because you know if elected that he will ring true at this time on every national issue.

John MacAulay knows nearly all the boys of Bruce 160th from this riding, and he would no more go back on them than he would on his own flesh and blood.

NOT A PROFITEER

Mr. C. M. Bowman, M. P. P., has been reading at public meetings a letter written by one S. Hildred, in The Ripley Express, in which it is intimated that Col. Clark had "grafted" in "ammunition contracts."

"I never profited to the extent of a dollar of any sort," said Col. Clark, while in Port Elgin last week "I have exerted myself to get contracts for North Bruce manufacturers, and have succeeded to some extent. Mr. Bowman is a shareholder in two of the companies that received such orders, and is in a position to find out whether I had any financial interest in either of them. He knows I did not and has no reason to suspect I had in any other. The only interest I had was a public one. I desired to secure contracts for North Bruce industries at a time when they were very necessary, not only for the employers, but for the employees as well."

[Advertisement]

WHO IS THE PROFITEER

Mr. C. M. Bowman M. P. P., who has circulated a story to the effect that Col. Hugh Clark "grafted" on munition contracts, is a shareholder in two companies—one in Port Elgin and one in Southampton—for whom war contracts were secured. He knows that Col. Clark had no financial interest in these two contracts Other contracts were secured for firms in Wiarton and Kincardine. In none of these had Col. Clark any financial interest.

Mr. Bowman who gleefully circulates this story is the man who whined so much not long ago when he was accused of being a German and of making huge profits out of dredging contracts and "commissions" on the building of the Algoma Central Railway. He has not denied the latter but he has the former. He was always thought to be of German descent, and certainly he was always in demand in election campaigns in German districts because he was believed to be German and speaks the language fluently. He disowns his German origin now and says he is of Swiss parentage. He has not yet denied that he made a fortune out of government contracts and "commissions".

Hon. Hugh Guthrie Speaks at Port Elgin

The town hall was filled yesterday afternoon with people anxious to hear Hon. Hugh Guthrie, Solicitor-General of Canada in the Union Government's interest. Mr. Guthrie made a remarkable address. He has long been recognized as one of the most brilliant advocates in parliament He was booked for high honors in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's cabinet if the old Chief should prove successful. Mr. Guthrie, however, took his fine prospects in hand and followed his convictions to the Union government side where his merit and his courage as the first one to take the plunge was promptly recognized. Mr. Guthrie is one of the best stump speakers in Canada—a veritable whirlwind of energy and persuasion.

Col. Hugh Clark, the Unionist Candidate also made a good speech. Mr. A. F. George made a very efficient chairman.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

Lesson XI. December, 16, 1917.

Nehemiah Enforces the Law of the Sabbath.—Nehemiah 13: 15-22.

Commentary.—I. The Sabbath desecrated (vs. 15, 16). 15. in those days—This was during Nehemiah's second residence in Jerusalem. It can not be determined exactly when it was. His first journey from Shushan to Jerusalem was in the twentieth year of his reign (Neh. 13:6) to come again to Judah, but it is not known how long after arriving at Jerusalem he undertook the reformation in the matter of the desecration of the Sabbath. saw I in Judah—This was outside the city of Jerusalem in the agricultural districts. Nehemiah himself saw the Sabbath desecrated. treading wine presses—The wine-press consisted of two vats, one higher and larger than the other, sometimes hewn from the rock. Into the upper vat the grapes were placed, and men crushed them with their bare feet to press out the juice, which flowed into the lower vat. on the Sabbath—The fourth commandment strictly forbids secular work on the Sabbath, and God carefully provided that it should be kept sacred to him. This commandment is as much in force now as when it was originally promulgated. bringing in sheaves—Grain was brought into the city for threshing. and lading asses therewith (R. V.) — These various kinds of labor were carried on in violation of the law of the Sabbath. Sheaves of grain are still loaded on the backs of donkeys and camels brought into Jerusalem—The people carried on ordinary farm work on the Sabbath and they made a practice of taking their produce into the city, even into the sacred city of Jerusalem, on that day. the day wherein they sold victuals—From the language here used it appears that the Jews brought their goods into Jerusalem on the Sabbath, but did not sell them on that day. When they were selling them on that day. When they were selling them on the next day or the following days, Nehemiah rebuked them for having broken the Sabbath by bringing their produce on that day. 16. there dwelt men of Tyre—It is probable that some from the region of Tyre, a city northwest of Jerusalem on the coast of the Mediterranean, formed a small colony in the city, and were engaged in trading in the products of Tyre.

I. Sabbath-breakers rebuked (vs. 17, 18). 17. contended—The word indicates that Nehemiah was in earnest to put an end to the practice of Sabbath-breaking. nobles of Judah—There were persons of prominence whose influence would be great upon the common people. They had no occasion to violate the law of the Sabbath, even from a material point of view, for they had wealth and full control of their time. For their own sake and for the sake of their influence they should have refrained from desecrating the Sabbath. what evil thing is this—To break the Sabbath is to commit a long train of sins. It breaks a plain command of God. It fosters selfishness and greed. It brings one into an atmosphere of worldliness. It destroys piety and robs the soul of a disposition to worship God in sincerity. While it is robbing God of the time that justly and reasonably belongs to him, it is also robbing the Sabbath-breaker of his physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual powers. profane the sabbath day—God considered the observance of this day as of sufficient importance to formulate a command regarding it, but the Jews in Nehemiah's time and many of their successors have looked upon it as a day in which to get gain or seek pleasure. There is no gain, but rather loss, in desecrating the Sabbath. 18 did not your fathers thus—The Lord said, "But if ye will not hearken unto me to hallow the sabbath day, and not to bear a burden, even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day; then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, and it shall not be quenched." (Jer. 17:27). The people of Judah had been faithfully warned by the Lord's prophet, they had gone forward in their evil ways and the threatened destruction came upon their city. Nehemiah called the attention of the Sabbath-breakers to what their ancestors had suffered through disobedience to God's law. ye bring more wrath—The Lord was taking note of the departure of his people from him and their sin would not go unpunished. Nehemiah was faithful and fearless in rebuking transgressors of God's law.

III. A thorough reformation (vs. 19-22). 19. gates .... began to be dark before the Sabbath. The twilight is short in the latitude of Jerusalem, and darkness comes on soon after sunset. The Jewish Sabbath began with the going down of the sun. gates should be shut—The gates of the city were closed as darkness came on, not be opened till after the Sabbath. Nehemiah not only gave orders regarding the observance of the Sabbath, but also took measures to enforce his commands. The gates were not to be opened for the passing in and out of merchandise on the Sabbath. They were guarded by trusted servants who would not allow any Sabbath-breaking use of the gates. There was free passage for lawful travel. 20. lodged without Jerusalem once or twice—"The merchants and sellers of all kind of ware" came on the Sabath as usual with their merchandise, but being refused admission for their burdens into the city, they were under the necessity of remaining outside to watch their wares. They came the second time, thinking that the new order would not be strictly enforced. It is likely that, as another reason for their oming the second time, the people of city went out to them and bought s on the Sabbath, a market-place temporarily established outside ls. 21. then I testified against Nehemiah was determined in I will lay hands on you— for gain made the Sab- bold and led them to res to make void Nehe- ; but they found to face with a man of resolution as well as piety. Nehemiah was not the man to see God's law trampled under foot while he had authority to have it enforced. The greedy Sabbath-breakers believed he would have them arrested if they again defied the law and "from that time forth came they no more on the Sabbath." 22. Levites—Members of the tribe of Levi. They had charge of the secular service pertaining to the house of the Lord. should cleanse themselves—They were to make themselves ceremonially clean and thus be prepared to engage in the direct service of the Lord. should come and keep the gates to sanctify the Sabbath day—The language would indicate that the charge of the gates on the Sabbath was committed to the Levites. Inasmuch as the integrity of the law of the Sabbath was involved, it seemed fitting that this sacred duty should be placed upon them. They would be serving the Lord as directly there as they would in the secular affairs of the temple. remember me—Nehemiah was desirous that his efforts should be crowned by the Lord with success. He wished for his continued help.

Questions.—Who is Nehemiah? To what work was he called? What results had already been achieved through his efforts? In what particulars did he find that the law of the Sabbath was being broken? What was his first step in having the desecration stopped? What further measures were adopted. With what success did he meet?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—Law enforcement.

I. A means of religious reform.

II. A measure against intruders.

I. A means of religious reform. This chapter brings into pointed contrast the promises of the Jewish people, recorded in chapter ten, and their subsequent practises. In nearly every particular their covenant, so solemnly entered into, was broken. In Nehemiah's absence the affairs of his people fell rapidly into disorder. A promise to observe the Sabbath was one of the articles of the covenant governing the conduct of the nation. Among other deplorable departures from the law of God, Nehemiah found that his countrymen had fallen into flagrant disregard of their vows upon that most vital issue. The observance of the Sabbath was to the Jewish people a typical commandment. It was a specific law and strict observance of it was much insisted upon. It was a great grief to Nehemiah, this great profanation of that holy day in the holy city so recently reconstructed and dedicated to God. The law of the Sabbath was openly defied. The sacred character of the day was set at normal and was fast disappearing. Neighboring customs had crept in and prevailed over Jewish principles. The occupations of the people were allowed to go on as if there was no Sabbath day. It was decidedly a swift and terrible reaction which had followed the fervor of the great revival when Nehemiah had gathered the people together and engaged them in a very solemn covenant, followed their enlightenment in the law and their profound repentance. There followed general decay in matters of religion when the people forsook the sanctuary and profaned the Sabbath. It was a very serious deduction, demanding a most vigorous reform. To promote the due observance of the Sabbath was a work of piety, benevolence and patriotism. The Sabbath was instituted with the beginning of the race. It was included in the religious and moral statutes given by God to Moses, signifying its permanence. Its observance was insisted upon by the prophets and declared to be decisive of national prosperity or decline. Nehemiah showed the people the testimony of God's word against Sabbath desecration before he enforced the law or took measures to perpetuate the reform. Nehemiah set about to change the whole aspect of affairs, to re-establish the true order of religious life. The conscience of the people was with Nehemiah. They felt that it was useless to resist his resoluteness, backed by such authority as he possessed. His fundamental work when he first went to Jerusalem was to reconstruct the nation on the basis of the divine law. He turned Jerusalem into a strong fortress and made it possible for the people to develop into a nation of superior order. His sagacity, forethought, power of organization and management, depth of feeling, power to inspire and rule others, calm consideration in laying his plans, vigor and determination in executing them, enabled him to conduct the various reforms of the nation.

II. A measure against intruders. Nehemiah made a public protest and promoted active measures for the suppressing of Sabbath desecration. He acted in harmony with the powers of his commission and the law of God. He prepared for a time when he would not be there to act the part of a pious patriot and governor. He confronted and reproached the nobles and rulers as well as the traders and salesmen. The vigorous remedies which he applied were administered first to the rulers. He laid first blame upon them. In the case of an Israelite piety and patriotism could unite in a degree difficult to maintain in others, the nation being God's chosen people, owing to him its existence and its laws, and set apart by him as his special treasure and for his special praise. Nehemiah followed his rebukes to the offenders with practical measures. He had the gates kept closed during the Sabbath. He appointed Levites as permanent guards, bidding them purify themselves, as for a holy service before taking their posts. He threatened to punish dealers who lodged near the wall during the Sabbath. His energetic measures succeeded permanently.

BRITAIN'S GREATEST NEED.

An Illustrated Booklet under the above title has been issued by Dr. Barnado's Homes, dealing with a subject of vital importance to the welfare of the Nation. Britain's manhood is being drained in fighting to preserve all that we hold dear. It is our duty to those who have so bravely given their lives that their supreme sacrifice should not be in vain. Who are to take their places but the children? The poster of the early war days was addressed to our men; it is now also addressed to the Babies, and its claim upon them is as vital as its claim upon our potential fighting men—your country needs you! It is of paramount importance to the British Empire that, so far as possible, every child born within its limits shall be brought to man's estate. The work which will devolve upon youthful shoulders behooves us to see to it that those shoulders are fitted for the task; that those young lives are well nurtured, in order that they may have healthy minds in healthy bodies; that they are trained, in discipline and in resource, to fit them to become the patriotic citizens of the future, imbued with noble ideals and aspirations. There are thousands of children of our brave soldiers and sailors who are left as a sacred legacy to us. These children have lost the necessary parental control. Let us not fail in our duty towards them.

We cannot ourselves go out to seek and aid these children, but we can find a delegate to do the work in our stead; and such a delegate is not far to seek. For fifty years, Dr. Barnado's Homes have been doing the work which has been so urged upon us during this serious war time. During those fifty years, Dr. Barnardo's Homes have taken charge of 84,000 children, and who can say what would have become of those 84,000 if the Homes had not given them a fair chance of becoming useful, industrious and God-fearing citizens?

10,261 Barnardo Boys are serving in defence of their Country? They are fighting for you. One of those lads is thus described by Lord Beaverbrook in his book "Canada in Flanders" (Vol. 1):—

"Those were days of splendid deeds, and this chapter cannot be closed without recording the most splendid of all—that of Sergeant Hickey, of the 4th Canadian Battalion, which won for him the recommendation for the Victoria Cross."

Lord Beaverbrook then describes Hickey's brave deeds, and concludes: —"Hickey, who was a cheery and a modest soul, and as brave as any of our brave Canadians, did not live to receive the honor for which he had been recommended." Brave Hickey was a Barnado boy.

Of four Anzacs mentioned in despatches for bravery at Gallipoli, three were Barnardo boys. Two of these have since gained the Military Medal. Thirteen in all have won the M.M., and another has gained the D.S.M.

Since war broke out, Dr. Barnardo's Homes have admitted no fewer than 5,023 boys and girls, and they want to take charge of thousands more. They have the oportunities and the machinery, if you will help them with the necessary financial means. Gifts of all kinds—money, food, clothing, blankets, etc.—will be welcomed by the Honorary Director, Mr. William Baker, M.A. LL.B., at Headquarters, 18 to 26, Stepney Causeway, London, E. 1.

SUNDAY AT HOME

A SONG OF THANKS.

Thankful for strength in strife;
For faith more steadfast than the stars above;
Thankful that life is life,
And love is love.

Thankful for homes, and birds
That hide the hills; for harvests ultimate;
For the sweet, prattling words
Of children at the gate.

For Hope's "Good morning" and Faith's sweet "Good night," when we are realmed in rest,
Led by an unseen hand
Safe to an unseen breast.

—F. L. Stanton.

WALK IN LOVE.

A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.—Above all things have fervent charity among yourselves; for charity shall cover the multitude of sins.—Love covereth all sins.

When ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any; that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses.—Love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again.—Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth, and let not thine heart be glad when he stumbleth. —Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing; but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing.—If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceable with all men.—Be ye kind to one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth.

DISAPPOINTMENT.

(By the late Rev. H. T. Miller.)

That prefix "dis" is a terror; it is a knife that cuts, a fire that burns, a darkness that separates.

What is it to appoint? To bring back to a point, to fix with power or firmness, to establish by a decree, ordain, prescribe.

Man appoints and is soon baffled; foiled, he retires in defeat; he hides and eats bitter bread. God appoints, and His fiat stands, stands fast. He speaks and it is done. He commands, and it stands fast forever. He makes no journeys. He wastes no time. He is never disappointed.

Disappointment marks men and destines them to blood and agony. To be subject to disappointment is a mark of superiority. The lower animals know it not, but man is akin to God. One single soul is worth all the world, because it has obtained the chief attention of God. The spirit whose centre is God existed before matter and without matter. Matter was created only to serve as an instrument to the created spirit—as form to its life and object to its activity.

Disappointment marks men for her own because they look at the form of life and the object to be attained. The revolutionist, the politician, the lover, are frequently among the disappointed. The rebellious dwell in a dry place. They rebel against their higher nature, the true selfhood. This selfhood is entire, but it is mutilated by greedy and daring men. They go to pieces, they balk, they are not fixed, the anchor drags, the moorings are unsound. Pitch thy objects high, thy behavior low, so shalt thou gracious and magnanimous be.

"There are heats
So perilously fashion'd that for them
God's touch alone hath gentleness enough
To waken—and not break—their thrilling strings."

Be careful where you put your trust. If in man, you walk on thin ice, and you have many a fear. Trust ye in the Lord for ever.

He is not a disappointment! Jesus is far more to me
Than in all my glorious day dreams I had fancied He could be;
And the more I get to know him, so
the more I find Him true,
And the more I long that others should be led to know Him too.

The Lord is hungry. He wants all the heart. He is jealous. He must have no competitor, no rival. He must be served with a whole heart, not in fragments, but wholly (holy). Say to Him: "Oh, God, my heart is fixed. I will sing and give praise."

"He is not a disappointment! He is all in all to me—
Saviour, Sanctifier, Healer; the unchanging Christ is He!
He has won my heart's affections, and
He meets my every need:
He is not a disappointment, for He satisfied indeed."

Swimming With a Cold.

In an address before the leading ear, nose and throat specialists of the country, Dr. Hill Hastings, of Los Angeles, recently called attention to the danger of a person's swimming, and particularly diving, when he has a cold in the head. Comparatively few persons realize that it is dangerous, and many even believe that when they have recovered from a cold and are still annoyed by excessive thick secretions in the nose they can find relief by diving or plunging the head under water. The purulent matter washed out is not only a danger to others, says Dr. Hastings, but the diver himself runs a risk of forcing some of the pus into his middle ear. Most specialists have observed that cases of mastoid abscess are common every summer during the swimming season. At the large ear, nose and throat hospitals it is recognized that the swimming season invariably brings on "a crop of mastoids." The advice to keep out of the water until a "head cold" is entirely cleared up can not be too strongly emphasized.

Seven Days King.

Masaniello (Thomas Aniello), born 1622, was known as the "Seven Days King." He headed a revolt against the Duke of Arcos, at Naples, July 7th, 1647, forced him to abolish the tax on provisions and for seven days was master of Naples. He was most arrogant and bloodthirsty and was assassinated July 16th. He is the hero of two operas, one by Carafa, called "Masaniello," and the other by Auber (libretto by Scribe), called "La Muette de Portici."

Marines.

Marines—soldiers serving on shipboard—date back to the year 1664, when an order-in-Council, dated Oct. 18, authorized 1,200 soldiers to be raised and formed into a regiment. More regiments were later on formed, and in the latter years of the French wars they numbered 32,000. The marines are to-day a feature of every navy, and in most countries officers of the marines are equal in rank with those in the army and navy.—London Chronicle.

"I'll Stop Him," Said He.

A man who had just finished a comfortable meal at a restaurant the other evening suddenly rose from the chair, caught up his hat and umbrella that stood against the wall and rushed out of the building.

"Stop him!" exclaimed the proprietor. "That fellow went out without paying."

"I'll stop him," said a determined looking man who rose up hastily from a table near where the other had sat. "He took my gold-headed umbrella. I'll stop him and I'll bring him back in charge of a police officer, the scoundrel!"

Without a moment's hesitation he dashed out of the house in hot pursuit of the conscienceless villain. And the proprietor, a cold, harsh, unsympathetic kind of man, has somehow begun to suspect that neither of them will ever come back.—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

Saving.

Some women formed a resolution to do something about the high cost of living. "Something," they insisted, with fatty courage, "that will count!"

Accordingly, they banded together and so perfected themselves in the art of making up their minds that, whereas it had hitherto taken a salesgirl an average of two hours to sell a yard of ribbon, she could now turn the trick in 20 minutes flat.

The economic saving, of course, was in the aggregate, enormous, making itself felt all down the line.—New York Times.

Through Many Trials

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"I could not comprehend Sir Philip's treatment of me to-day," Dumaresq [illegible], excitedly, his words unsteady through agitation; "his anger, and contempt, and haughty imperiousness seemed so disproportionate even to my alleged offence. You know what he said to me, Lady Petherick?" he asks, agitatedly, forgetting how she, on a former occasion, disclaimed all knowledge of the real reason of his dismissal. "You know what he charged me with?" he persists. "Unmanly and dishonorable assertions about your sister, Miss Trefusis."

Evelyn's very lips grow pale, and a sort of spasm passes over her face, as her dark brows draw suddenly together, and the little white fingers resting on the velvet-covered table near at hand clinch themselves into a knot.

"Yes—yes," she says, sharply and hastily, her eyes flashing angrily for a moment, and then averting them, while her rich bloom utterly fades, and her breath comes gaspingly through her dry lips, in the unholy excitement and fear that possesses her.

"I know; such absurdity! But you must not bring my dear little sister's name into this matter!" she says, peremptorily. "I cannot permit it. I am quite sure you have only acted and spoken as a gentleman should. I want to know no more."

"But I should wish you to know the truth—the whole truth," Dumaresq persists, but faltering with the sense of disappointment that comes coldly upon him. He had suffered himself to hope several times that Lady Petherick meant to make him confess the truth of his feelings for Imogene, and ascertain exactly how matters stood between them, and though he did not even distantly hope that she would encourage him, he augured happily from her evident interest in him, her exceedingly gracious kindness to him.

This was before the "wherefore" became visible in the violet-scented, lamplit little boudoir.

"Sir Philip accused me," Dumaresq says, in a low tone, "in measured terms; accused me of clandestine 'villainy' and 'treachery'—those were his words—and I should be glad," he says, earnestly, addressing Lady Petherick, "if you will honor me by allowing me to confide in you."

"Confide what in me?" Evelyn asks, sharply, almost harshly, looking at him with gleaming eyes and a white, haggard face.

"About—your sister," he says, and wishes as soon as it is uttered that he had left it unsaid.

"What about my sister?" she demands, desperately, a lurid flame of color surging into her cheeks.

"Sir Philip accuses me of trying to carry on a clandestine love affair with her," Dumaresq mutters, nervously, "and I assure you, Lady Petherick, on my honor and faith as a man, I never, at the time had even——"

But here a shrill, impatient laugh prevents his further utterance.

"Such absurdity! Such preposterous nonsense!" Lady Petherick exclaims, passionately, fiercely almost, while her shrill, half-hysterical laugh rings out again. "I am perfectly sure," she says, determinedly and gravely, "that you never presumed on your license of friendly acquaintance with the dear little motherless girl, and I will neither allow you to defend yourself—being quite innocent—nor to discuss my little sister!"

And Dumaresq sees she is quite determined to allow him not a word more of explanation.

And a mocking spirit seems to thrust the "wherefore" before his eyes in letters of fire, and its answer writ large below.

"I am not going to discuss Miss Trefusis," he says, quietly, looking into Lady Petherick's glowing eyes and carmine cheeks, "she is to me as an angel."

He sees the little white teeth sink in her red nether lip at his words, but she still sustains her role of frankness and indignant disclaiming of the possibility of Richard Dumaresq being Imogene's lover.

"Quite right," she says, calmly: "she is a dear angel of a child."

"A child, do you call her, Lady Petherick?" he retorts, coldly, and again looking at her with steadfast meaning. "I thought her almost a woman."

"But she will not suffer him to see the pangs of the jealousy that devours her.

"Did you?" she says, carelessly. "She is tall for her age—she will be sixteen soon, I think. And now about your cousin," she continues, dismissing the first subject with a wave of her hand. "I am quite determined, Richard, that he shall not play the jay in borrowed plumes at your expense any longer. I mean to make him confess his misdeeds—some of them, at least—against you; confess them in writing, if in no other way—confess to his uncle how much he has wronged you; and make that dear, crusty old viscount ashamed of himself."

"How will you 'make' Richard Heneage 'confess'?" Dick inquires, skeptically.

"I will 'persuade,' 'induce' him, then, if you like the word better," Evelyn says, with an inscrutable smile. "I think I can do so much with him. Leave him to me, and do you act as I bid you, and at the right moment, and all will be well with you. You will be reinstated in your proper position, and live long and be happy forever afterward," she says, brightly laughing.

"You are quite a good fairy," Dumaresq says, uneasily, smiling a little, "but I think you are reckoning without the viscount.

"I am not, indeed," she says, merrily; "the viscount is my trump card; dear, cross, melodramatic, old uncle! Leave the viscount to me, likewise, Richard; I think I can charm his stubborn soul."

"I think you could charm an Egyptian sphinx if you tried," Dick says, rather recklessly.

"Indeed," Evelyn says, with arching brows. "Do you think I am as dangerous as Circe, then?"

"I hope not," Dick says, curtly; "Circe's charms transformed men into brutes."

"Then I hope I am not as dangerous as Circe," Evelyn says, smiling, and looking down.

"You ought not to be 'dangerous' to any honest man," Dumaresq says again, bluntly and impatiently, "when you are another man's wife."

He is vexed with himself for the fascination that the "charms" he affects to set aside are exercising over him. He is angered with her, half afraid of her, half-bewitched by her. He wants to speak bluntly and unpleasantly to her, to alter finally her mood and manner toward him; and her keen, quick intelligence conveys it to her, and she determines to vanquish him then and there.

"Yes, I am another man's wedded wife," she whispers, faintly, and the red lips quiver piteously, and the violet eyes fill with tears. "I seem to hear that always—like a sentence of doom—and see it always—like great prison bars—between me and youth, and love and liberty! Oh, Richard! it is a dreadful thing to know you have made a mistake when it is all too late to set it right." And then comes a choking sob, and the bright tears fall on her tight locked hands. "It is dreadful for a woman to look forward to the long, dreary days of a spoiled life! I am only twenty years of age, and I may live for fifty years yet!"

He listens to her; he looks at her, with her piteous, beautiful eyes, her falling tears, her heaving, white breast, her clasped hands, and sudden, passionate emotion rises and seems to check his breathing.

"What did you marry him for?" he asks, roughly, "for his money?"

Evelyn looked at him with an air of hopeless, timid sorrow.

"No; only through girlish folly, dazzled by the idea of wealth, urged on by my aunt's worldly arguments. I have spoiled all my life, Richard!" she cries, with a wail of despair.

"No, no, you haven't—don't say that," he says, huskily, half distracted, and ready to knock his head against the wall in vexation for the position into which he was drifted. "You are young, and—and beautiful, and wealthy; the world cannot be a very dreary place for you."

"Without love, or hope, or happiness?" Lady Petherick asks, drearily; "do you wonder I was glad to see you the other day? You seemed a part of the old life, though I had only seen you once."

The lustrous, velvety eyes turn on him with a languid, sweet, sad smile; the "wherefore" is looking at him from these eyes now.

"I heard of you often in letters from home. I saw you but once at Portreath; the day I was leaving home and you were standing on the steps, you remember?"

"Yes, I remember," he says, stupidly, for the magic odors of the Circean cup are stealing over him.

"I saw you once again—one night at the theatre—the very night I had given my promise to Sir William Petherick," she goes on, in a low, sad murmur with sighs, and timid, appealing glances, "and, oh, I was so miserable afterward."

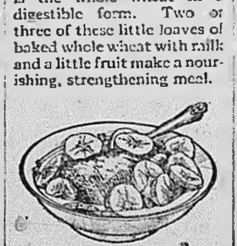
"Because you were false to the man you loved? I saw my cousin with you that night," he says curtly.

"I never loved him—never!" Evelyn says, coldly. "I never knew I could love until it was too late! I knew it that night."

Dick is utterly silent, dumb, stupid, only for the blood tingling madly through his veins.

"Why did you know it that night?" he asks, mechanically, in a thick, hoarse voice, not his own, somehow seems to speak through him, and he loses almost a sense of his identity.

In These War Times you want real food that contains the greatest amount of body-building material at lowest cost. The whole wheat grain is all food. Shredded Wheat Biscuit is the whole wheat in a digestible form. Two or three of these little loaves of baked whole wheat with milk and a little fruit make a nourishing, strengthening meal.



Made in Canada.

"Because I suddenly saw you," she whispers. "Oh! why did you ever come to Portreath? Why did an unhappy fate bring you here to London just then, to make the life that lay before me bitter, burning misery?"

The witchery of her presence is about him; her soft voice is murmuring in his ears; her perfumed, silken hair touches his; her warm, sweet breath is on his cheek; her languorous eyes look into his, and he succumbs to the glamour of the spell she has cast over him.

He takes her in his arms and kisses her.

Then he gets away, blindly, out of the room, out of the house, and walks away, wither he knows not, for hours, into the chill midnight.

Only one sentence he utters twice or thrice low in his own heart during those long hours of aimless wandering: "I shall never dare to meet Imogene again."

And Lady Petherick waits until he is safely gone, and then she laughs aloud, though her heart is throbbing fast with excitement, and the tears are wet on her lashes yet. A convulsive, long laugh of amusement, and triumph, and malice combined.

"I thought I should conquer him and outwit my precious little Imogene!" she mutters, scornfully smiling, as she looks at herself in the glass. "Let her dare to vaunt any of her absurd immature love fancies to me, and I—will confess to her that he is my lover, too! I should think that was sufficient to shock her simple soul out of all sentiment," laughs Evelyn; "or, if not, I might add a version of the story of Miss Nellie Montesquieu! Poor Dick! What a horrible character he will be in her eyes! It is quite as good as the best play ever played, and it makes me feel there is something to give one an interest in life, after all," concludes Lady Petherick.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The dull, damp afternoon is deepening into the gray, misty twilight over Warminster-on-Sea, and it is "blind man's holiday" in the cozy front parlors at Atlantic Terrace.

Perhaps the coziest and prettiest, and most spotlessly neat is the front parlor, yclept the "dining room," of No. 2 Atlantic Terrace, where, in the firelight and the gloaming, sits Miss Jane Proude, coziest and most comfortable of spinsters, dozing in her easy-chair, with a delicious sense of Something accomplished, something done,

To earn a night's repose," which the "Village Blacksmith" never more thoroughly experienced.

For this has been "a field day," so to speak, in the "turning-out" of rooms, store closets, and drawers; and Miss Proude and her faithful handmaiden, as her sole aid and ally, have achieved a gallant victory over dust and disorder; and No. 2 is, in consequence, shining with cleanliness, radiant with polishing, from garret to cellar. So it is no wonder that she sleeps the sleep of the just, and wakes up to the fire, and her cozy cat's company, and to the pleasing consciousness of Henrietta's toasting the crumpets for tea, as an agreeable odor creeps up the stairs from the kitchen, when, all at once, a peal at the front doorbell and a knock startles her out of all thought of repose and fills her soul with anxious forebodings.

"I do hope it isn't dear Miss Brown," Miss Proude mutters, adjusting her cap and a little "false front" in a tremor. "I've got my old merino on, though it is clean, and——"

When Henrietta appears in the doorway flushed and smiling, as is the manner of youthful servant maids when the advent of an agreeable visitor of the other sex occurs in feminine households.

"Please'm, Mr. Doomurrick, yoir nephew, ma'am!"

This last in a stage whisper. And Dick Dumaresq, putting Henrietta jovially aside with a slight squeeze of her plump arm, which makes her giggle immensely, marches in, with his swinging, military tread, and kisses Miss Proude heartily.

"Law bless me, my dear boy! Dick, my dear boy, you are welcome! Why, I haven't seen you these three months!" his aunt exclaims, delightedly. "Hennie, the lights and the tea, please, as quick as you can! I'd strew green rushes for you, as the saying is, Dick, if I had them—you're such a stranger!"

"Thank you, Aunt Jane," he returns, earnestly, a little quiver of feeling in his tones despite his gay smile. "I might go far before I should meet with such a welcome as yours."

Some bright visionary ideas occur to him ever and anon as he watches Miss Proude's neat servant laying the table with fresh, satin-white damask, and the glittering silver electro teatray, the best silver teapot, and a tempting array of toastable dainties, in addition to the hot dish of toasted crumpets.

Imogene might be very happy here, with her beloved brother, poor Lionel, somewhere near, in this cheerful, quaint little seaside town, peaceful and happy, the brother and sister who love each other so, and he, happy and blessed, thrice blessed to work for them both, to work in the great city all day, and then come home here by the fast evening train, when the toil of the day was over—come down to meet her, his fair Imogene, his sweet young wife—to have her welcome him home!

[illegible] with the tumultuous rush of glad thought and sweet hopes, and does not hear a word of Miss Proude's enthusiastic speech.

"I suppose you've never met her, then, Dick?" he hears at last, in a very disappointed, questioning tone. "You couldn't forget her if you had, I'm sure!"

"I'm sure I couldn't," he answers, smiling. "Describe her to me again, aunt, please."

"There! I can't!" Miss Proude says, with quite vehement enthusiasm. "I can only tell you what I've just told you. I never saw so handsome a girl in all my life!"

"Good gracious!" Dick says, wickedly, but cautiously, trying to discover his bearings. "Perhaps she is not my style, aunt."

"Nonsense, Dick, my dear!" Miss Proude retorts, firmly. "You couldn't help admiring the loveliest girl you ever saw in your life. Now, could you?"

I wish there was a Walker House in every little town

I wish there was a WALKER HOUSE
  In every little town;
Then I could travel merrily,
  And always sit me down
At night in peace and comfort,
  Happier than king with crown,
If there was just one Walker House
  In every little town.

I wish there was a WALKER HOUSE
  In each place where I go,
The comforts of my dear old home
  While on the road I'd know.
The meals—the Cheerful Service, too,
  Would leave no cause to frown,
If there was just one Walker House
  In every little town.

The Walker House

The House of Plenty — Toronto — Geo. Wright, E. M. Carroll

"No, indeed," she says, laughing, "and you think Miss—Miss—I didn't quite catch her name—is so superlatively lovely, then! Got money, too?"

"I think she is very wealthy," Miss Proude says, impressively; "of course she doesn't say in so many words that she is rich, or has a large fortune, but I know her people are very wealthy. I hear her allude to her carriage and horses, and her waiting-woman, and everything like that. She was presented at court this last season, and as for jewelry—she has an emerald and diamond ring on her finger—one among several, Dick," Miss Proude says, in almost awe-stricken tones, "and she told me that one cost a hundred guineas!"

"And whereabouts does this wealthy young woman live, aunt?" Dick persists, for the fun of the thing, half-believing that his simple-minded aunt has lent a very credulous ear to the fanciful assertions of some handsome young lady of the tribe of Judah.

"I tell you, Dick, I haven't an idea beyond that it's somewhere in the West End her papa's house is," Miss Proude says, somewhat crossly. "You weren't listening."

"I confess the truth, aunt," he says, smiling, and flushing a little; "I was thinking of somebody else, and did not hear all you said about your charming friend; her name, for instance, has quite slipped——"

"Brown, I told you; Miss Brown," Miss Proude interrupts, impatiently. "You didn't hear a word I was telling you, Dick. And she knows you quite well, and knows your cousin, and Lord Heneage, and——"

"Who does? Miss Brown?" Dick asks, amazedly. "I know no such person—stay, I do know a Miss Brown, the daughter of my landlady—a rather fine-looking, showy girl. Aunt, she has been imposing on you. She lives in Mounteagle Villas, Shepherd's Bush, and helps her mother with the family washing, cooking and cleaning and goes out of an afternoon in black satin and sealskin; and she wears several showy rings, too, now I recollect."

"Nonsense, boy. Don't you talk nonsense," Miss Proude says, angrily, in her perturbation. "She is a highbred, elegant young lady, and you pay me a very poor compliment to suggest that a vulgar, common girl could impose on me."

"I beg your pardon, aunt," he says, penitently, while his eyes are sparkling, "but as I know but one Miss Brown, what am I to think? I beg your pardon, though, for having impugned your knowledge or judgment; give me a kiss to show I am forgiven."

Miss Proude lifts her face to the tall, military figure which has marched around to her tea tray, and who was a penitently to be kissed on his bronzed cheek.

A Guide to German Propaganda

Let it be granted that we are the finest people in the world, physically, mentally and morally. It follows that all we do is right and all that other peoples do is wrong (even if it is the same as we do).

Let it be granted that our forefathers, the Huns, were the finest people in their time and that we have improved on them in all ways in our time.

A scrap of paper is a treaty signed, sealed and delivered and witnessed by our good old German God. Treaties are made to be broken as convenient to us.

A concession is giving up something which we never had, or which we no longer have, in exchange for something other people have.

A just peace is a peace which gives us all we want and the power to get ready for the next war.

A German Frontier, in like manner, is one that will give an opportunity to begin the next war with advantage when we are ready.

A German peace is one which will enable us to carry out our preparations for the next war unsuspected and undisturbed, as we did this time.

A German victory is an action about which we say that we have defeated the enemy's plans though we do not know what those plans were.

A German defeat, if such a thing is possible, is when we are forced to give ground "according to plan" (our plan). But we never call it a defeat. We call it a victory.

A German defeat and a German victory look very much alike and are both the opportunity for many lies, much flag-flying and bell ringing (by order).

A peaceful Germany is always trying to keep the peace and sow distrust, between other nations, till she herself is fully armed and ready for war.

A German resident abroad is one whose duty it is to be a military and commercial spy. If naturalized his duty remains the same, but will be more easily discharged.

A fortress (enemy) is an open town such as Southend or Margate.

A hospital ship (enemy) is a ship with all the marks of a hospital ship, but which we say is a transport for troops.

A Red Cross nurse (enemy) is a person to be shot at and killed whenever possible. If in German hands so much the easier and better.

A ship's crew is a number of sailors who should, after their ship is sunk, be either fired at in the water or collected on the deck of a submarine, which then submerges. The crew may be either enemy or neutral; this is called the freedom of the seas.

A prisoner of war (enemy) is an unfortunate who should be treated as we treat them, according to our kultur.

An inhabitant of occupied territory is an offensive animal who should be treated as badly as or worse than a prisoner of war, if possible; the fact of being a neutral is no palliation.

A fruit tree is a thing to be cut down if in an enemy country.

A well is a thing to be poisoned, if in an enemy country.

A church is a thing to be destroyed, if in an enemy country, as all things not the product of our kultur and too heavy to carry away should be destroyed.

I have said all these things many times, therefore they are true.

MEDICAL SCIENCE

SCALDS AND BRUISES.

Perhaps some of the most serious accidents in a home result from scalds and burns. Much suffering can be saved if the right method of home treatment is understood. When a person has been severely burnt send immediately for the doctor. Do not attempt to tear or pull off the clothes. Leave them just as they are, and, if any portion of the flesh is visible, spread vaseline, carron oil or olive oil over it. Wrap the patient in a linen sheet, if available, if not, anything light and cool will do, but where possible saturate it with oil. This excludes the air, and is all that is necessary until the doctor arrives. When no doctor is at hand, cut away the clothing very gently, and immediately cover the burns with carron oil, and swathe the parts in oiled lint and cotton wool. A scald is treated the same way, but if the blisters are very large they may be gently pricked out with a very fine needle (which has been well sterilized) to allow the liquid to drain away. Afterwards cover with lint soaked in oil with a cotton wool pad on top of it. The greatest danger with severe burns and scalds is the resulting shock. When this is severe the patient is pale, more or less in a state of collapse, while the extremities are very cold, the pulse irregular and the temperature below normal. In this case little can be done in the home, and a doctor should be in attendance. Where there are children no mother should be without a supply of carron oil (made by mixing equal quantities of linseed oil and lime water), lint, cotton wool, and soft linen rags, so that they may be easily available when required.

APPENDICITIS.

The seat of this disease is the vermiform appendix, a round worm-like process, about three inches long, opening into the intestine low down in the right side at the junction of the large and small intestine. This is very liable to inflammation, because the narrow opening is apt to become clogged by pieces of undigested food, grape seeds and skins, fruit stones and other substances. Appendicitis comes on very suddenly with acute pains, tenderness, rise of temperature and vomiting. The inflammation may be followed by an abscess which may burst the appendix, and cause peritonitis. In some cases the inflammation subsides without developing into an abscess and the patient recovers. But there is always danger of a recurrence of the disease, and this has to be guarded against. The patient must be exceedingly careful about his diet, and avoid chills. In an attack of appendicitis home treatment is of little avail. The diet should be very light, and hot fomentations, applied at once, but the medical attendant must be sent for immediately the disease is suspected, an operation has often to be performed instantly to save the patient's life. Even if the attack is only a mild one the doctor may consider it advisable to remove the appendix, and thus avoid the danger of an acute attack which might end fatally.

EYE HEADACHES.

Headaches are frequently caused by defective eyesight, and are generally more violent in summer than in cooler weather. This is probably due to the intense glare of the sun, which is always trying when there is a tendency to weak sight. Then, too, the long hours of daylight lead to a continual strain of the eyes. The eye is a wonderfully adjusted organ and when the sight is normal will stand a good deal of use, even under adverse conditions, before it protests. Quite ninety per cent, however, of people have more or less defective vision, probably very slight, but sufficient in itself to cause a severe headache. When there is a tendency to eye strain or headache affecting the eyes, the sufferer should have the eyes seen to at once by a competent oculist. It is false economy to put off the matter, as time only makes things worse. Glasses may be recommended, which will banish the headache once and for all time. Failing glasses, the sufferer should never read in a train or tram, and when reading on the beach take care that the eyes and book are well shaded by a parasol.

A FRIEND'S ADVICE

Woman Saved From a Serious Surgical Operation.

Louisville, Ky.—"For four years I suffered from female troubles, headaches, and nervousness. I could not sleep, had no appetite and it hurt me to walk. If I tried to do any work, I would have to lie down before it was finished. The doctors said I would have to be operated on and I simply broke down. A friend advised me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and the result is I feel like a new woman. I am well and strong, do all my own house work and have an eight pound baby girl. I know Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound saved me from an operation which every woman dreads."—Mrs. NELLIE FISHBACK, 1621 Christy Ave., Louisville, Ky.

Everyone naturally dreads the surgeon's knife. Sometimes nothing else will do, but many times Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has saved the patient and made an operation unnecessary.

If you have any symptom about which you would like to know, write to the Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., Lynn, Mass., for helpful advice given free.

THE TREATMENT OF BABY AILMENTS.

If an otherwise healthy baby is sick immediately after a meal it is an indication that the stomach has been overfilled and rejects the unnecessary food. This is easily remedied by giving the baby less food at each meal. If, however, the vomiting comes on some time after a meal, and it associated with pain, or colic, or perhaps diarrhoea, it is a sign that something is disagreeing with it. A teaspoonful of castor oil should be given, and if this does not stop the vomiting by removing the offending food, give only barley water for a few hours. This will generally stop the vomiting, and allows the stomach to recover its tone. Constipation is often very troublesome with bottle-fed babies. The best treatment is to add a teaspoonful of fresh cream to each bottle of food. This, with an occasional dose of fluid magnesia, will generally regulate the bowels. As the child grows older the cream may be increased, and a teaspoonful of olive oil will help matters. A very thin piece of bread very liberally spread with butter is another natural aperient, but this cannot be given until the baby is nine or ten months old.

A GOOD EXAMPLE

Nothing that the C. P. R. has done in the direction of food conservation has resulted in so many letters of commendation, as the footnote printed on all menu cards on C. P. R. dining cars and hotels. This reads:

"In the interest of food conservation, young lambs, little chickens, little pigs, and their by-products, are not used in the C. P. R. service."

The editor of a prominent mining journal says in a leading article:

"It must have required some grit, as well as a full sense of duty for an institution which includes such hotels and restaurants as are found on that railway, to put such a memorandum before their high-class patrons. But it has been done, and its moral effect has been wider than the actual wastage that has been saved. Those who have read the notice have, in some cases at all events, followed the good example of the railway and have given up purchasing any of the immature animal food.

"If the food controller would prohibit the sale or use of these young animals it would be another means of food economy."

EDITORIAL COMMENT

In all your gifts to the boys abroad or in the camps,—tobacco, goodies, from home, wearables, etc.,—do not overlook the fact that what they appreciate most are letters from home at regular intervals and the old home town papers.

Quebec, outside of Montreal, only subscribed seventeen million dollars to the Victory Loan. But then, that's about the average share that province has taken in Canada's effort to help the Mother Land, in this great war.

No man pleases everybody. If he does, he is weak-kneed, carries water on both shoulders, and won't tell the truth But when a man don't please you, be man enough to go to him and talk with him, rather than talk on the streets and say things you would not say to his face

Although the U. S. had a well-planned scheme for the drafting of men to the army, it has made several changes lately, using some features of the Canadian system. The idea of calling up a certain number of men and then using the ballot has been abandoned, and the Canadian system of calling up men, and classifying them is used instead. The U S. takes in the married man as well. The pay of Tribunals has also been increased from $4 per day to $1.25 per hour. The U. S is working on a plan of classifying five million men and preparing for from three to five years of war.

One thing the government must keep in mind, and that is, the necessity of an ever ready market for Victory Bonds. Thousands of people have, through enthusiasm, placed all their savings, or borrowed money to put in these bonds While this is to be commended, many bondholders may need money and will often wish they had the use of that tied up in Victory Bonds. It will therefore be necessary that the government have a ready market, so that at least the small investor, who finds himself hard run, may exchange his bonds for cash and at par. And there should be no good reason why the banks, who receive many concessions from the governments, should not be used by the government, as a means for exchanging bonds for cash.

Those who had the privilege of receiving a copy of "The Victory Telegraph", were startled to read such headings as "The Germans take Canada", "Halifax in Ruins", etc. The issue was dated Nov. 28, 1921, and was for the purpose of boosting Toronto's Victory Loan campaign. The paper was filled with rather amusing paragraphs of prominent Torontonians, and had also many interesting articles of things supposed to have happened on the above date. But after reading the paper, and meditating a moment on the startling headlines, one can easily arrive at the conclusion that the headings state exactly what would happen to Canada if Great Britain, for one moment, ever let up in the vigilance she keeps with her great fleet. In view of this can Canadians do too much for the Mother Land ?

The demands of this terrible war are roughshod on some families. In a home in this town there lives a widow and her daughter. There are two sons, one of whom has been fighting for nearly two years for his home and country. The other son has been engaged in a Toronto bank. Last week the Tribunal disallowed the son's exemption. An appeal was made, but the appeal judge sustained the tribunal. In view of these circumstances, and in many other cases of a similar nature, where town and city men are concerned, it would seem that those who administer the laws have little regard for conditions; have only in mind that men must be got, and from the villages, towns and cities. Where a family is already represented at the front is it justice to take the remaining son ? Those who look for favors because they happen to be doing, at the time, a work that gets exemption for them, are placed in a peculiar light in the eyes of those mothers who must sacrifice their all.

Who'll Be Our Reeve ?

With the appointment of Reeve Izzard as Good Roads superintendent, Port Elgin citizens will have to look round for another man to guide the affairs of the town.

Whoever that man may be, one thing is sure, he will follow a man "who knows," and the town will require a man well versed in municipal affairs.

Some names have been mentioned, who are not now serving, or never have served on the council. This is quite legitimate, but The Times believes the town would be well served by any one of the present councillors. These men have given time and consideration to town work, and deserve promotion. In Messrs. Eidt, Pattison, Cottrill and McCallum Port Elgin has been well served and if there are any honours to be passed out they should go to the men who have given service

Asleep in Jesus

The angel of death came to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. McDonald on Monday Nov. 26 and took their little daughter, Frances.

Although sick for months, death came unexpected, she having been better for a couple of weeks and had that day been looking forward to Christmas and Santa Claus. Deceased was a remarkably bright little girl and had many friends in her short life. The funeral was held on Wednesday Nov. 28th, to the Inverhuron cemetery.

Dr. McKechnie Says We Must Conserve

Conserve is the word Canada must soon heed. The editor had the privilege of spending a very pleasant couple of hours in company with Capt. McKechnie one evening last week. Dr. McKechnie is a former Saugeen man, who went to Vancouver, and became known as a specialist in surgery When war broke out his services were sought and he went soon to Salonika and in Greece he has spent two and a half years Now he is invalided home, being bothered with malaria, and stopped over here to visit his brother Robert and sister, Mrs. Mocher

Capt. McKechnie abandoned a practice which brought him nearly $10,000 a year, and when people get worrying over how much they think they are doing to help win the war, turn to the thousands of men in the professions who have closed up their business, their all, and gone into the army at army pay. measured by this standard, how foolish it is to attract attention to the giving of a few dollars.

But we are getting away from our story, Dr. McKechnie didn't say anything of his sacrifice, we gathered it from questions we put, but he did say that the whole man power of Great Britain has been conscripted "Talk about farming," said the Captain, "the women and old men are doing it in England, and producing more foodstuffs under the system, than was ever produced before. There is not an able bodied man of eligible age in Britain who is not either at the front, or in army service."

"There are 11,000,000 men in England alone serving either in the army or doing war work. There is no room there for the man who wants to do a certain work for profit. Everything is conscripted."

"No one can fully appreciate what it meant to the Allies when the United States entered the war. The Anglo Saxon is the greatest soldier in the world", said the doctor

Referring to Greece, he said that the climate was much like southern California, but there was considerable malaria and the soldiers frequently contracted it. They raise great crops of barley, wheat etc., the ground being very fertile. but their methods of working were woefully behind times. They plow with the same kind of plow that Abraham of old used —just a stick in the ground pulled by an ox. When cutting time was on the whole family went to the field with knives, sickles etc., and later the oxen tread out the grain. They spin the wool and make their own cloth and clothes, everything done as in the early days of John the Baptist. The shepherds abide in the fields and watch their flocks by night, while it is only lately that the brigands have been cleared out of the land by the Greeks. Wheat sold there for $8 a bushel.

Rationing in England is carried out with a vengeance. Dr. McKechnie while staying at a $3 a day hotel was served with very small portions of bread, potatoes, meat, milk and sugar, and everything is carefully watched by the Food Controller The saloons are open only a few hours a day now, but they are crowded with women.

"This is the one thing a Canadian does not understand" said the doctor, "how in this terrible struggle Britain cannot shake off the drink evil."

SUPPORT UNION GOVERNMENT

Liberals and Conservatives are United
The People Must Unite to Win the War

A Laurier-Bourassa Victory means deserting our boys in the trenches for over a year, throwing up our hands and quitting! Don't shout "Kamerad" under the Referendum proposal. Come out and fight for Union Government.

Make No Mistake

IF LAURIER WINS:

(1) Canada will send no more reinforcements to the front, which practically means quitting the war and placing the country in the same class as Russia.

(2) The French-Canadians who have shirked their duty in this war will be the dominating force in the Government of the country.

ARE THE ENGLISH-SPEAKING PEOPLE PREPARED TO STAND FOR THAT?

It is because the French-Canadians have not done their duty that Conscription had to be resorted to.
The French-Canadians have made it perfectly clear that they do not like the war and are against Canada participating in it further. Some of them even go to the length of saying that the soldiers should be brought back from the front.
The Nationalists are demanding that the men who have been enrolled under the Military Service Act be disbanded and sent back to their homes. To secure the Nationalist support Laurier-Liberal candidates in Quebec have signed the following pledge:—

> "I, the undersigned; candidate in the Federal Elections, undertake by these presents; if I am elected, to demand the immediate suspension of the Military Service Act, 1917, and of all its effects until Canadian electors have pronounced by way of plebiscite; and should the majority of the electors condemn it, that it be considered as null from its origin and that in consequence all conscripts be disbanded."
> "I also undertake to vote against any Government which should refuse to adopt the above enunciated policy."

Boost a Little

Do you know there's lots of people,
Settin' round in every town,
Growlin' like a broody chicken
Knockin' every good thing down?
Don't you be that kind o' grouch,
Cause they ain't no use on earth,
You just be a booster rooster,
Crow and boost for all you're worth.

If your town needs boostin', boost 'er,
Don't hold back and wait to see
If some other fellow's willin'—
Sail right in, this country's free.
No one's got a mortgage on it,
It's just yours as much as his,
If your town is shy on boosters,
You get in the boostin' biz.

If things just don't seem to suit you,
And the world seems kinder wrong,
What's the matter with a boostin'
Just to help the thing along.
'Cause if things should stop a-goin'
We'd be in a sorry plight,
You just keep that horn a blowin'—
Boost her up with all your might.

If you know some fellow's failin's
Just forget 'em, cause you know
That the same chap's got some good points,
Them's the ones you want to show.
"Cast your loaves out on the waters,
They'll come back", a sayin' true,
Mabbe, too, they'll come back "buttered"
When some feller boosts for you.

Is a United Quebec to Rule All Canada?

This, the most tremendous question in Canada's history, is to be answered within ten days.

Our answer involves Canada's honour, her freedom and her future. Old-time party questions are being advanced to obscure the gravest issue ever placed before a nation. Canada is in real danger. The clouds that obscure her vision must be brushed aside so that the great issue stands forth clear and distinct.

"Is a United Quebec to Rule All Canada?"

To-day, in our national crisis, Quebec alone among all the provinces stands more united than ever before. She knows what she wants:

(1) Withdrawal from the war.
(2) Bilingual schools everywhere.
(3) Weakening of the ties of British connection.
(4) Political control of Canada.

From the Ottawa River to Labrador and the Gulf, a common purpose actuates Quebec in her determination to profit by the factional divisions of Canada and to impose her will upon all the people of Canada.

Within the last few weeks, Quebec has mobilized all her forces to dominate Canada under the unified leadership of Bourassa and Laurier. Canada knows that these two men in their earlier days were personal friends and political associates. Canada knows how in recent times they gradually drew apart—until in 1911 Bourassa opposed Laurier and helped to bring about his defeat, at the polls. Canada knows that from that time forward, until a few weeks ago, the breach between them steadily widened until envy and hatred, each toward the other became the possession of both. Bourassa and his followers were anathema to Laurier.

Should not the people of Canada ask themselves, before it is too late, why these two men have suddenly agreed to bury the past, why this sudden embrace each of the other? If we will but let the scales drop from our eyes the answer is obvious. The all-compelling influences of Quebec have combined to force the union of Laurier and Bourassa in the common purpose of French Canadian domination.

We concede the right of French Canadians to make common cause of anything they think it is in their interests so to do. This is a free country. But as the French Canadians have already combined to assert their views, it is the duty of the hour that we English-speaking Canadians get together and present to Quebec a united front in the defence of our rights. This is imperative.

With sixty solid seats Quebec is about to accomplish her designs. Bourassa, the real master and idol of Quebec, is in sight of his goal.

To attain her purpose, Quebec has not scrupled to ignore British traditions and to suppress freedom of speech. So thoroughly organized is her campaign to prevent even the discussion of the war that Unionist candidates are prevented from holding public meetings throughout that Province. The Unionist minority in Quebec are the victims of organized obstruction.

To be successful in her determination to rule all Canada, Quebec has but to secure a few seats in each of the other Provinces. Quebec leaders now seek to divide the rest of Canada into factions by insidiously bringing into political discussion old-time party questions, to divert the public mind from Quebec, her purpose and her ambitions.

United in her determination to quit the war, Quebec would compel a divided Canada to do likewise. By union only can the English-speaking people prevent this calamity.

However well-meaning Laurier candidates in Ontario may be, they will be helpless against a united Quebec.

Apart from the splendid work of the small English-speaking population, Quebec has failed the Red Cross, has failed the Patriotic Fund, has failed in recruiting and has failed in the Victory Loan. Dare we trust our soldiers, their wives, their children, their pensions and their allowances to Quebec, that will neither give, enlist nor invest, and which will resist taxation for the support of our men and their dependents?

Canada must decide whether she will become a deserter and quit with Russia, or fight to the end for liberty with Belgium. This decision must not be dictated by the only Province which has shirked its obligations throughout the war.

All Canada knows that Germany has been working through agents, spies and bribes in every country in the world. The latest evidences are the revelations recently made to the world by President Wilson. Do we Canadians think the Kaiser has overlooked Canada? If we do, what a fool's paradise!

Germany benefits by division among her enemies. Upon whom would she look in Canada as furthering her designs? Not Sir Robert Borden, Mr. Rowell and their colleagues in the Union Government. That is certain. But can the same be said with respect to the leaders in the Province of Quebec whose attitude in this war is against Canada's continuation in the war. We regret to be compelled to say these things, but we must not shut our eyes to facts.

The Citizens' Union Committee, anxious for the maintenance of British ideals and traditions, views with alarm the menace of French-Canadian domination with its inevitable influence upon the home, the school and the state.

We, therefore, call upon all English-speaking men and women to realize that—Canada, divided by political factions and old-time party questions, is at the mercy of a united Quebec. Union Government alone can save Canada from the menace of French-Canadian domination.

Farm Workers will be Exempted From Military Service

Mr. Justice Duff's first judgment rendered as Central Appeal Judge for Canada on Dec. 7th, makes it quite clear that farm workers are entitled to exemption on the grounds that production must be maintained in order to sustain the Military power of the Allies. This judgment of the appeal judge is binding as law upon appeal tribunals and local tribunals throughout the whole country. Another judgement by Justice Duff shows that exemption is favored for men with brothers already at the front or in service.

D. A. Campbell's Views

The question asked of me and no doubt of many others in this district who have sons at the front how we can vote against the Union Government and thus deny our sons (as they think) the necessary support. Were I to endeavor to give all my reasons, I am sure I would encroach on your space.

If this new scheme were a real Union Government composed of honest men representative of both parties, really bent on winning the war and that only I would gladly work and vote for that Union but the combination presented to us now is simply a Tory Government with a few Grits added to damage their name, afraid of their past work as a party and appearing on the scene under a new name waving the win the war flag, to cover up their sins, and asking our support not on their past record but of their future promises.

Why do I doubt the win-the-war sincerity of this party? Because Mr. Borden returned to Canada, from England months ago, knowing, as he says, the dire need of men, yet took no steps to get them till November 10th. Why not conscript men sooner if needed, simply because his party wanted Conscription and Election to go hand in hand, trusting the one to help win the other. I also doubt the sincerity of Mr. Borden's supporter in this district. Mr. Clark in peace times carried the title of Colonel, As military man, what active service has he given to win the war? He has taken a fat salary at Ottawa instead of donning a uniform—I ask you is he sincere?

As to supporting our boys at the front, I cannot trust this Borden combination to do this because they have not done so in the past three years. Who supplied our boys with paper-soled boots? the Borden government, because Govt. friends made them. Who mounted them on old crippled horses? the Borden Govt. because profiteers purchased them. Why did many a brave lad die with a useless Ross Rifle in his hands? because the Borden Govt. friends manufactured this Rifle and it must be used. Why have our boys faced mud, cold, hardship and death itself for $1.10 per day for three years? because the Borden Govt. was too busy making men rich at home to give them any more. To-day this same party is crying the urgent need of men, and are telling us that the wounded are returned to the trenches before they are fit for service. Tell me good reader, in the name of justice, if this is so are they dealing fairly with our boys, sending them back before they are fit, and at the same time holding an army of 110,000 (Minister of Militia figures) men in England, some of them for over a year. My two sons in France for over a year on active service, were sent there with a few months training in England. I have no fault to find with this, they were needed, and many others in this district can say the same, but why now if they need support is the support being held in England. I appeal to my readers to reason this out for themselves. Is it a cry for men to win the war or to win the election?

Further I contend that the Borden Govt as well as denying proper support to our boys at the front, have denied proper support to their dependents at home. With living advanced about 75% in three years, what has the soldiers pay advanced? Nothing! What has his pension advanced? Nothing; What has his separation allowance advanced? Five dollars in the last month. Why! You would almost think it came now to win the election.

We all admire the noble women who have given their sons and husbands to fight the battles of freedom but we also admire the host of women in Canada, who are giving their time and their energy in sewing and knitting and sending boxes of comforts to our boys at the front. The unjust Borden Franchise act has not recognized this class but let me say, and in saying it I voice the feeling of many others, we who have sons on the firing line, tender these noble women our sincere gratitude and will do all in our power to elect a just Government which will extend the franchise to every true Canadian woman.

A Traitor to your Country! Your vote is bought with German money! You are voting for the Kaiser, when you vote against Borden. Surely, this epithet, Traitor, cannot be hurled at me, with two sons in the trenches in France, with my own service offered to the 160th battalion when formed but refused and now working 100 acres, with a lad of 14 years. No I am no Traitor, and I have given all I could offer to fight the Kaiser, and to-day I stand out and out opposed to the Borden Government as unjust and unworthy of support and I again appeal to my readers think this matter out for yourselves do not be misled by press or pulpit, simply use cold, common sense, review the record of the Borden Government and if it does not stand four square, condemn it as unworthy of your support by voting on December 17, for the man who is known in his home town as honest John McAuley.

Yours truly,
D. A. Campbell

Mr. Simon Lake Would Run Submarines Under Vancouver Harbor Ice!!

MR. SIMON LAKE is an indefatigable inventor of things feasible, and things impossible, connected with under-water navigation.

His latest proposal is to waste no more time bucking against heavy ice-breakers, but to dive under, and proceed beneath the ice. He says he has the boat to do it.

Here is his own statement in the International Marine Engineering, for January.

"Professor Nansen, in his North-Polar explorations, has stated in his book that his average rate of progress during eighteen months, in attempting to reach the North Pole, was only three-quarters of a mile per day, and that the thickest ice he found during these months of endeavor was fourteen feet. His progress was delayed by open waters, slush, ice, and in the winter by the intense cold, which compelled him to 'hibernate' for a considerable period of time."

Mr. Lake proceeds to discuss a trip of 150 miles under ice on one of his proposed boats.

After such a run, it would be necessary to stop and recharge the storage batteries. If open water should be encountered, this recharging process would be done by bringing the vessel to the surface. If the ice was not too thick, then by blowing out the water ballast the ice would be broken, since it is very much easier to lift the ice and break it, rather than to force it apart or downward, as surface vessels are compelled to do.

"Provision is made for boring a hole up through the ice so as to permit the drawing in of sufficient air to run the engines and to recharge the batteries. Provision has also been made for putting out small mines underneath the ice to blow an opening to permit the submarine to come to the surface.

MR. SIMON LAKE.

"A telescopic conning-tower arranged to cut its way up through ice twelve or fourteen feet thick is also provided to enable the boat to remain under the ice and still permit the crew to reach the surface.

"In navigating in an ice-pack, the method of procedure would be to reduce the buoyancy of the vessel to, perhaps, a couple of tons, and then steam ahead, and it will be observed that the forward portion of the boat extends downward a considerable distance under the water, so that when the forward portion of the boat contacts with heavy ice the reserve buoyancy will not be sufficient to lift or push the ice out of the way, and the vessel will then be automatically pushed under the ice and run along in contact with the under surface of the ice. A toothed recording wheel would give the exact distance traveled, and of course the compass will give the direction. Progress could be made in perfect comfort and safety under the ice at a rate exceeding 100 miles per day.

"The vessel is to be fitted with torpedo-tubes, and an athwartship propeller in the stern for training the vessel, and also with bottom wheels to permit navigation on the water-bed. This combination would permit vessels of this type to enter ice-bound ports or harbors and destroy the enemies' shipping while the same lies 'frozen in' and helpless."

It all sounds very plausible, but Mr. Lake rather spoils the story by stating that an under-ice submarine for mail-transportation in Vancouver Harbor has actually been in contemplation by the Canadian authorities!

It might be suggested to Mr. Simon Lake that he should nestle down in his little submarine below the waters of Vancouver Harbor, and wait for the surface to freeze over, in order to prove the value of his invention!

By the time his waiting came to an end, he would be ready for his "portion in the place that burneth with fire and brimstone!" because ice on Vancouver Harbor has never yet been seen nor is it likely to be.

Testaments for Soldiers.

Island of Serpents

Less than thirty miles east of Sulina, the second important Black Sea port of Roumania after Constanza, is the tiny island of Serpents, around which cling many fantastic legends of fascinating interest as well as several historical episodes which at one time threatened to become of international moment, says the National Geographic Society bulletin.

Unlike the monotonous reaches of reed-covered marshland which stretch for fifty miles along the Roumanian and Russian shores to the north and south of the Sulina mouth of the Danube and seldom attaining an elevation of more than two feet above the level of the Black Sea, the Island of Serpents, or Fido nisi, thrusts its precipitous cliffs above the water to heights ranging from fifty to a hundred feet. It is a mere fleck of rock in a sea whose depth a few yards fom the shore is twenty fathoms.

The islet is scarcely more than a mile in circumference, but has been a beacon guiding ships to the Danube for many centuries, its elevation being in such striking contrast to the delta land of the great river.

In ancient times Fido Nisi had a variety of names, but Grecian poets and travellers referred to it most frequently as Lence, or the White Island, on account of the numerous sea fowl which at certain seasons of the year swarmed over its cliffs.

It was on this island that Thetis, the marine goddess, is supposed to have carried the ashes of her son, Achilles; hence the temple erected here in honor of the hero of the Trojan war. Another legend relates that Thetis snatched the body of Achilles from the funeral pyre, that he was restored to life, and that thereafter he lived on the island with Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon, who had been saved from sacrifice by the goddess Artemis.

One of the most poetic descriptions of the island and its temple is given by Arrian in the account of his voyage around the Black Sea in the second century of the Christian era. He wrote:

"It is related that Thetis gave this island to Achilles, and that he still inhabits it. His temple and statue, both of very ancient workmanship, are seen there. No human being dwells on it. It has only a few goats, which mariners convey to it as votive offerings. Other offerings or sacred gifts are suspended in honor of Achilles, such as vases, rings and precious gems.

"Seabirds, divers and fowl innumerable frequent the island, and the birds alone have the care of the shrine. Every morning they repair to the sea and, dipping their wings in the waters, sprinkle the temple and afterward sweep with their plumage the sacred pavement."

The name Island of Serpents grew out of the fact that numerous black snakes from four to five feet long were discovered here by mariners. Many of the reptiles are said to have fallen in the cisterns of the island and polluted the waters, which are now undrinkable.

The Amazons are supposed to have attempted to seize this island on one occasion, but the ghost of Achilles appeared and so terrified the horses of the female warriors that the riders were thrown and severely trampled upon, whereupon the expedition was abandoned.

This meager rock brought England and Russia to the verge of war sixty years ago, following the treaty of peace which ended the Crimean conflict. The island was not mentioned in the terms of the treaty, and when Turkey sent a small party to relight the lighthouse, which had been dark through the struggle of 1855-6, Russia attempted to take control of the beacon which stands as a guidepost to the Danube's mouth. England protested and sent a fleet across the Black Sea to enforce her demands in behalf of her then recent ally, the Sultan. Russia, after a brief threat of resistance, yielded.

The island passed into Roumanian hands when that nation threw off the Ottoman shackles in 1877.

Punch and Judy originated in China about 1,000 years before Christ. The Emperor Mir of the Chow dynasty was one day making a tour through the empire when an entertainer named Yien Shi was brought into his presence to amuse the ladies of his court. TOMB OF MANY KINGS.

Bones of Sixty Monarchs Lie in the Isle of Iona.

On the little misty, stormy swept island of Iona in the Hebrides to the west of Scotland, lie the ruins of the monastery whence came the men who Christianized the British Isles. The island has changed but little from what it must have been in those remote times. The same dense fogs still veil it, rising from the warm gulf stream, the same westerly gales howl over it, and in the little sheltered grassy hollows the simple people live and till the soil as they did in the days of St. Columba, who founded the monastery. Their implements may be more modern, but they are the same silent, kindly Celts.

Iona is the most fertile and beautiful of the Hebrides, of which there are some 500 scattered about the waters to the west of Scotland. Only about 100 of these islands are inhabited at all, and the greater part of these latter support less than a dozen people each. It is a region of rain and mist, with rare clear days that are like the infrequent laugh of a sad but kindly nature-god. The atmosphere of the archipelago is made for dreams and silence. It seems out of the modern world.

Iona has been a sacred spot time out of mind. Long before the earliest missionary came to Britain, it was a place consecrated to the early Druidic ceremonies. After St. Columba founded his colony, the ground was held so holy that kings bade their subjects bury them there. The bones of sixty monarchs, Irish, English and Norse, lie under the sod of Iona to-day. One spot, known as the Tomb of the Kings is still marked by a row of monoliths, fenced in by an incongruous modern iron railing. It lies in a bare plain, whose surface is dotted with other stones and monuments, half covered with grass, leaning sadly awry. It is a long time since those stones were raised.

In spite of a gloomy climate, Iona is beautiful. The soil is so fertile that for centuries its fertility was regarded as miraculous, due to the atmosphere of holiness rather than the soil. Behind its sea cliffs, the swale rises and falls in dimpled green hollows; the beaches are white with shell and sand. The sixty kings have chosen a fair resting place.—Exchange.

THE PEASANT'S RIDDLE

And How the Sicilian Kept the Promise He Made to the King.

A Sicilian laborer told us this story. He says his mother told it to him when he was a child. It sounds like one of Grimm's tales and is undoubtedly very old folk lore:

"My mother told me that once there was a king who saw a peasant working in a field and asked him how much he earned. And the peasant said, 'Four carlini a day.' 'What do you do with your 4 carlini?' asked the king. 'One I eat, the second I put at interest, the third I return, and the fourth I throw away.' This puzzled the king, and he asked the peasant what he meant. And the peasant said:

"'I buy my food with one. I feed my children with the second, and that is putting money out at interest. I feed my old father with the third, and that is paying back what has been given me. I give the fourth to my wife, and giving her money is throwing it away.'

"'That's a good riddle,' said the king, 'and I must tell it to my friends. Promise me that you won't tell any one the answer till you have seen my face a hundred times.' So the peasant promised, and the king went back to his palace and asked them the riddle. Nobody could answer, but one remembered seeing the king talk to a peasant and asked him about it. But the peasant said: 'I can't tell you. I promised the king I wouldn't tell the answer till I had seen his face a hundred times.' 'Oh, that's easy!' said the king's friend, and he took a hundred lire out of his pocket and every piece of money had the king's face stamped on it.

"So the peasant told the king's friend the answer to the riddle, and the king's friend went back to the palace and said to the king, 'I can guess your riddle now,' and he did. Then the king became angry and said: 'You couldn't have guessed it. That peasant has broken his promise!' So the friend had to tell the king how he had fooled the peasant.

TIN'S BIG PART.

Very Useful is This Metal in Our Industries.

The threatened shortage of tin is a reminder of the importance of that metal and of the part it has played in the commerce and industries of the world from remote times. In all the books of history treating of the ancient world it is recorded that the Phoenicians made voyages beyond the pillars or the gates of Hercules— the straits of Gibraltar—and sailed as far to the north as that land now called England, bringing back among many other commodities tin from Cornwall. Tin was an export of prime importance from the British islands centuries before the invasion of Britain by the legions of Caesar.

Tin is referred to in the Bible, and scholars have learned that copper was alloyed with tin by the Egyptians at least 1600 years before the coming of Christ. Pliny has something to say about tin, and students of his writings believe that in his time the Romans had no very clear understanding of the difference between tin and lead, but they knew there was a difference, because they called lead "plumbum nigrum" and tin, "plumbum album." The early Greeks called tin "kassiteros" and the Hebrews called it "bedhil."

It was about the fourth century that the Romans, having come to a very fair understanding of the properties of tin, called it "stannum," which remains its technical or scientific name to-day. Its symbol in chemistry is "Sn," an abbreviation of stannum. At a much earlier period the Greek alchemists, who long experimented with tin, called it "hermes."

The tin deposits in the south of England are the oldest known workings in the world, and perhaps those that were next discovered and opened were in Saxony and Bohemia. It is believed that the manufacture of tinplate, or, as it was begun in Bohemia early in the 17th century, that it spread from there to Saxony, and it was introduced into England in the latter half of the 17th century.

Tinplate consists of iron or steel rolled into very thin sheets which are then coated with a composition of tin and lead, lead constituting from 75 to 90 per cent. of the composition. There have been processes and improvements in those processes for coating the iron sheets with the tin-lead mixture and these processes of "tinning" are very interesting. The use and production of tinplate have enormously extended with recent years, not only because of the remarkable growth of the canning business, but because of the popularity of tinplate for making containers of many shapes and sizes for a great variety of articles.

Tin is found in ores with many other metals and minerals and in lumps and grains in alluvial gravels. It is found in Siberia, Australia, Guiana, and, in fact, most parts of the world, but the notable workings, those which furnish the great part of the supply which the world consumes, are in Bolivia and the Straits Settlements.

A large amount of tin is consumed in the manufacture of tin foil, tons of which are used annually in the tobacco trade, and another extensive use for tin is in "silvering" the backs of mirrors. In being used in this way it is mixed with copper. Tin is also used in the making of bronze, brass and pewter.—Washington Star.

SERIOUS ILLNESS AVOIDED

Many a serious illness has been avoided by the prompt use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. These pills actually enrich and purify the blood, and in this way build up the system, tone and strengthen the nerves and invigorate the vital organs.

Serious diseases generally come from some simple disorder that has been neglected. Therefore any thinning of the blood should be looked upon as a warning sign, and more serious illness should be avoided by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. In the case of young girls and women the blood is peculiarly liable to get out of order—to become thin and watery—and to lead to a general breakdown in health. This can be avoided by the occasional use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which are suitable for the most delicate constitution. These pills will give you a new appetite, improve your digestion, tone and strengthen weakened nerves, banish depression and lack of energy, clear the complexion of pimples and blotches, cure pain in the back and general weakness, cause the disappearance of headaches, dizziness and heart fluttering. Give these pills a fair trial and you will soon note a wonderful change in your condition. Your spirits will brighten, good health and strength will return, and you will feel like a new person. You can confirm these statements by enquiring among your friends almost anywhere, as thousands and thousands of hopeless sufferers have been restored to new health and energy by using Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

You can get these pills through any medicine dealer or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

HELIGOLAND.

Once Fashionable Watering Place is "Bristling Fortress."

Some places, like some people, have greatness thrust upon them, and much greatness has, especially of late, been thrust upon the little island of Heligoland, which rises abruptly out of the the North Sea some thirty-four miles northwest of Cuxhaven. The Germans, since the cession of the island to Germany by the United Kingdom in 1892, have spent vast sums of money on it, in the effort to make it an effective naval base. They have built a sea wall of steel, granite and concrete, twenty-five feet high all round it; they have constructed a harbor for submarines at great expense; they have honeycombed the rock of its mighty cliffs two hundred feet high, with galleries—in fact, they have done everything that could be done to transform the island into a "bristling fortress." What they have done, however, is as nothing compared with what they have been credited with doing, by those who, with a sorry knowledge of the facts insist on regarding Heligoland as little less than the key to the naval and military strength of Germany. Germany has, of course, done much to the island since the outbreak of war; but how much is a question which could never, probably, be answered to everybody's satisfaction, because nobody, except the German authorities, knows.

The Heligoland, however, of the days before the war was open enough for anybody to see. Many visitors in the summer months of each year went to seek at its shelving beach of white sand, and indulge in sea bathing, in climbing the high red cliffs and in walking about on the green Oberland. And the first thing that struck the new visitor must surely have been the smallness of the place, a little triangular piece of land, just a mile long, and barely a third of a mile across, only one-fifth of a square mile in all. Centuries ago, however, Heligoland was at least five times its present size, and a place of no little importance. Like so many islands, it had a peculiar attraction for the peoples of the surrounding mainlands. They stood in awe of it, and mythology early claimed it for its own. Here the Forseti, the god of justice, had a temple, as had also, according to another tradition, the goddess Hetha, a special object of veneration amongst the Angles of the mainland. Later on it was the realm of the pagan king, Radbod, and it was hither that Sir Willibrod came, in the seventh century, preaching Christianity. But all the while the ownership of Heligoland was in dispute. Sea rover fought sea rover for possession of the island, until at last it became a fief of the dukes of Schleswig-Holstein. Even then, however, it had little rest, for, whenever the dukes of Schleswig-Holstein found themselves in need of ready money, they had a way of hypothecating Heligoland for loans advanced in the free city of Hamburg. Ceded to England in 1814, the island was, as already noted, transferred to Germany in 1893, and the Heligolanders did not welcome the change. They are not, as one writer clearly points out, Germans in any modern sense; neither have they, by race or language, any affinity with the Dutch Frieslander. They are, indeed, generally supposed to be survivals of the Saxons who remained behind when Hengist and Horsa and his followers set sail for England. But one may be forgiven the paradox, for, according to all reports, the civil population of the island was removed within forty-eight hours of the outbreak of the war.—Christian Science Monitor.

THE Hospital for Sick Children
College St., Toronto

ITS CHRISTMAS MESSAGE

Dear Mr. Editor:—

Thanks for your kindness in allowing me the privilege of appealing to your readers this Christmas time on behalf of the Hospital for Sick Children, the "Sweetest of all Charities," which has as its mission the care of the helpless the sick, the crippled and the deformed

There never was a year in the history of the Hospital when funds to carry on the work were more needed than now.

Your purse is the Hospital's Hope. Your money lights the candles of mercy on the Christmas trees of health that the Hospital plants along the troubled roadway of many a little life.

So I am asking you for aid, for the open purse of the Hospital's friend is the hope of the Hospital at Christmas, just as the open door of the Hospital's mercy is the hope of the little children throughout the year.

Calls on generous hearts are many in these times. Calls on the Hospital are many at all times, and especially when food and fuel and drugs and service costs are soaring high. YOU know the high cost of living. Do you know the high cost of healing—of helping the helpless to happiness? What you do to assist is the best investment you will ever make.

Do you realize what this charity is doing for sick children, not only of Toronto, but for all Ontario, for out of a total of 3,740 in-patients last year 646 came from 251 places outside of Toronto. The field of the Hospital's service covers the entire Province—from the Ottawa to the far off Kenora—from the borders of the Great Lakes to the farthest northerly district.

The Hospital is doing a marvellous work. If you could see the children with crippled limbs, club feet, and other deformities, who have left the Hospital with straightened limbs and perfect correction, your response to our appeal would be instant. In the Orthopedic Departments last year a total of 230 in-patients were treated; and in the Out-Patient Department there were 1,946 attendances.

Let your money and the Hospital's mercy lift the burden of misery that curses the lives, cripples the limbs and saddens the mothers of the suffering little children.

Money mobilizes the powers of help and healing for the Hospital's drive day and night against the trenches where disease and pain and death assail the lives of the little ones.

Remember that every dollar given to the Hospital is a dollar subscribed to the Liberty Loan that opens the prisons of pain and the Bastilles of disease, and sets little children free to breathe the pure air, and to rejoice in the merry of God's sunlight.

Will you send a dollar, or more if you can, to Douglas Davidson, Secretary-Treasurer, or

J. ROSS ROBERTSON,
Chairman of the Board of Trustees.

The only man who has more friends than he needs is the man who doesn't need any.

China and the Tartars.

The Manchu Tartars, who conquered the early Chinese, have left the impress of their former manner of life upon many styles seen to-day in Chinese fashions of clothing. For instance, the official coats, as seen in China at the present time, are made with very peculiar sleeves, shaped like a horse's leg and ending in what is an unmistakable hoof, completely covering the hand. These are known as horseshoe sleeves. This is owing to the intense love of the early Tartars for horses, from whom they were practically inseparable during their generations of wild wandering before settling down in China proper. The old queue is also said to have been worn in imitation of the horse's tail and also as a useful halter to tie about the horse when the Tartar curled up beside his beloved dumb friend for a sleep

PRESS PRAISES U.S. PRESIDENT FOR HIS WORDS

British Papers Deplore That It is Too Late for Russia.

VIEWS IN U. S.

Practically Unanimous in Support of Wilson's Mesage.

London Cable — President Wilson's message to Congress has the fullest possible prominence in the morning newspapers, but it reached London too late for much considered comment. The Daily News receives warmly the President's declaration that peace should be based on generosity and justice, to the exclusion of selfish aims. It adds:

"It would be affectation to pretend that this language echoes the declarations of the European spokesmen of the alliance. It is the voice of a statesman whose vision comprehends the world, while theirs comprehends only half a world.

"If President Wilson could have said earlier what he said yesterday, and if in Great Britain, France and Italy the responsible leaders had made his language their own, Russia might be to-day driving the enemies from her borders. It may be too late to convince Russia of the identity of aim of herself and the allied democracies, but it must not be too late for those democracies to learn from their greatest representative how democracies should comport themselves in war, and how they should attain peace.

"In the light of President Wilson's speech, a statement that will mean the wiping off the slate of much that should never have been written on it is imperative. There is no kinship between the spirit of yesterday's speech and the spirit of knockout blows or economic warfare or after-the-war boycotts."

The Daily Graphic says: "Whether this restatement, so lofty in spirit, so forward looking in effect, will have any influence on German opinion is doubtful. The only resort is to inflict such a military defeat upon Germany as to convince the Germans of the infamousness of their rulers. In this connection it is excellent omen that the conference in Paris reached such a complete unanimity. America was represented at the conference, and there follows that the war aims of the Allies no longer can be described in any sense as imperialistic."

BRUTAL WORK BY HUN U-BOAT

Fired Second Torpedo at the Apapa

While Helpless Were Being Put in Boats.

London Cable — The British steamer Apapa, according to the Daily Mail, was nearing home after a two-months' voyage when she was torpedoed without warning. The lifeboats were manned immediately, and all would have been rescued, but the submarine fired a second torpedo while the women and children were being lowered to the boats, causing the ship to sink immediately with 80 passengers and crew.

Another report says that forty passengers and thirty members of the crew, and that the survivors were landed on the west coast.

The Daily Mail appends to its story the names of some prominent U-boat victims, whose deaths were announced Tuesday. Among them were: W. R. Townsend, Attorney-General of the Gold Coast, and J. H. Langhurst, Director of Public Works in the Gold Coast.

THE MURDER OF GEN. DUKHONIN

Furious Bolsheviki Troops Were the Slayers.

Flight of Gen. Korniloff the Cause.

London Cable — [illegible] official statement [illegible]:

"A Russian delegation for the conclusion of an armistice was welcomed yesterday afternoon by the commander-in-chief of the east, Prince Leopold of Bavaria, in a [illegible] speech. Negotiations regarding the conclusion of an armistice were [illegible] begun, in which, under the chairmanship of chief of the general staff, General Hoffmann, the representatives of the German land and sea fighting forces and the plenipotentiaries of the chief army administrations of Bulgaria, Austria-Hungary and Turkey are participating."

An official announcement was issued by the Petrograd War Office to-day signed by Ensign Krylenko, the Bolsheviki commander-in-chief, confirming the killing by infuriated members of the Bolsheviki of General Dukhonin, former commander-in-chief of the Russian armies, who recently was deposed because of his refusal to request German army officials to enter into an armistice with the Bolsheviki.

Gen. Dukhonin was killed by being thrown from a train after the Bolsheviki forces had captured headquarters at Mohilev, where he had remained after his deposition. Gen. Korniloff, also a former Russian commander-in-chief, and who, some time ago, started an unsuccessful revolt against the Kerensky Government, fled from Mohilev before the arrival of the Bolsheviki forces.

The text of the communication of Krylenko follows: "To-day I entered into Mohilev at the head of the revolutionary troops. The headquarters was entirely surrounded without fighting. The last obstacle to the cause of peace has fallen.

"I cannot be silent on the sad act of lynch law practised upon the former highest commander-in-chief, Gen. Dukhonin. Popular hatred surpassed the limits of reason, and in spite of all attempts to save him he was thrown out of a railroad train at the Mohilev station and killed. The flight of Gen. Korniloff the day before the fall of headquarters was the cause of this excess.

"I cannot allow the banner of the revolution to be stained, and it is necessary strongly to condemn such acts. A revolutionary people are fearful in a struggle, but they must be soft after victory."

POPE REPLIES TO CRITICISMS

Not Implicated in Hun Moves in Italy

And Not Favoring Central Powers.

Archbishop of Westminster, has communicated to the Morning Post a statement from Cardinal Gasparri, the Papal secretary of state, answering the Post's accusation that the Vatican was implicated in disruptive propaganda in Italy and is unneutral.

Cardinal Gasparri declares that the accusation is an 'atrocious calumny,' and says that the hierarchy and clergy in Italy have given the most open and most generous help to the country's cause and have received unreserved praise from the Italian Parliament and Government. The Cardinal adds that long before the issuance of the Papal peace note, which is said to have been among the chief causes of the army's lowered morale, the clergy generally and the army chaplains particularly were laboring against the destructive propaganda which had been begun and was reported to be giving unrest to the civil authorities.

The Vatican, the Cardinal declares, is pained and indignant at the Post's charges, and regards them as insulting.

Referring to the accusation that the Vatican espoused the Austrian cause, Cardinal Gasparri reaffirms the full and correct neutrality of the Holy See. He says that complaints have been made in Central Europe that the Vatican is looking excessively toward the west, seeking to regain its former position in France, and to obtain a wider influence in the British Isles and North America. He adds:

"If some nations seem to be more favored by the Papal note, these certainly were not Germany and Austria-Hungary, but those of the Entente, particularly France and Belgium. The peace aimed at was not a German peace."

Cardinal Bourne tells the Post that Pope Benedict has been urged from each side to break with the Governments of the other side, thus throwing confusion into the religious life, now more precious than ever before, of millions of families, and punishing the peoples for the mistakes or misdeeds of their leaders."

"The supreme Pontiff," he concludes, "does not depend for instruction upon those who long before the war worked to diminish the authority which they are now invoking, nor does the Holy See shape its action by the flickering lights of human praise or blame."

The Post, in an editorial examining Cardinal Gasparri's statement, virtually reiterates its original accusation, and cites incidents which it regards as proofs.

BUSY IN MACEDONIA.

Bulgar Patrols Captured by French Forces.

Paris Cable — Fighting has been resumed on the Macedonian front, and despatches describe the activities of the [illegible]. Their airmen have been particularly active in reconnaissance work, but many of them have been brought down by British aviators, French anti-aircraft guns and machine guns.

The fighting has covered the front from the Struma to the mouth of the Vojussa, which practically bounds the Italian position in Albania, and a number of Bulgarian patrols have been captured by the French, who are installed in various places overlooking the valley of the Vardar, and especially on hills around Monastir.

GERMAN CRUISER SUNK BY A MINE

[illegible] Cable — It is reported from Drasser, at the northeast extremity of the Island of Ataneer, that a German auxiliary cruiser, the guard-ship Bothnia, was blown up after a collision with a German mine field off that coast. The cruiser sunk, but the number of men lost is unknown, the survivors refusing to give any information. The Bothnia was formerly a Russian vessel, which was captured by the Germans.

BIG SQUADRON OF CANADIAN FLIERS UPON ITALIAN FRONT

Ready to Aid in Repulse of Renewed Touton Attacks.

(Special Cable by the Associated Press)

With the French Army in Italy, Special Cable — Among the troops and units that have arrived in Italy with the British and French armies is a large group of aviators, who are impatiently waiting to get into action. The British have sent a large contingent of fliers, half of whom are young Canadians and Americans, who have been doing scout work in Flanders and northern France.

The squadron, which expects to be given work at the front very soon, is proving quite an attraction for the Italians. While awaiting orders the fliers are keeping themselves in trim, and the natives in fascinated delight, by practising over the town where they are billeted. There is scarcely an hour but that the hum of at least two, and generally four or more, motors is heard above the town, and every public square is filled with crowds gazing upward as the young aviators bank and slide and spiral and twist.

The British aviators apparently are much younger than their French comrades, whose numerous decorations attest their long experience. Both groups, however, are composed of picked men, who have had careful training in fighting the Germans in the air. The British squadron has many young men who won commissions by brave conduct on the front in France, and who were transferred to the aerial service from the infantry, cavalry and other arms.

The fliers are curious to know what the future holds in store for them, since few of them ever have flown over mountainous country as they will have to do here. They admit it will be a test to put them on their mettle, since emergency landings, generally feasible in France, are almost out of the question here. They anticipate, however, that they will not have to face superior numbers of enemy aviators, as it is not believed the Austro-Germans will be able to maintain a numerical advantage here. The Canadians and Americans nightly entertain their comrades and crowds of curious Italians by holding song festivals at their hotel.

One effect of the arrival of the French and British in Italy has been the rapid drop back to normal of the Franco-Italian exchange, which went up when the Austro-German offensive was in the full flush of its success. At that time 100 francs bought 160 Italian lire, but with the arrival of the troops the same number of francs now buy 125 lire, and exchange daily is approaching par.

BRITISH LINES STILL INTACT DESPITE HEAVY GERMAN DRIVE

Huns Up to Noon Tuesday Had Not Renewed Massed Attacks.

But Another Is Expected, Though Cost to Foe Is Terrible.

By R. T. Small, Staff Correspondent of the Associated Press.

With the British Army in France, Cable — The Germans up to noon to-day had not renewed their attempts of yesterday to smash the British front south of Marcoing, but it seems improbable that the enemy will allow matters to remain as they are now; therefore, the situation is still one that cannot be dismissed lightly, in view of the heavy concentration of guns and troops which von Hindenburg has brought to bear on this line.

There has been no change in the respective positions of the opposing forces since last night. Exhaustion and the necessity of reorganizing his depleted ranks have undoubtedly forced the enemy to pause for a breathing spell.

The ground won by the Germans yesterday could in no wise compensate for the wastage caused by von Hindenburg's disregard for the lives of his men. But it must be borne in mind that he was playing for vastly bigger stakes than have yet been won. In his latest attack there were undoubtedly tremendous efforts to break through, with great possibilities of a drive out into the open such as he engineered in Italy.

EASIER FOR THE BRITISH.

The situation to-day was much easier for the British. Yesterday was admittedly a rather anxious one, but abundant reinforcements arrived. The checking of the Germans' incessant massed attacks was due only to the gallantry of the dogged British soldiers, who did not yield before fierce assaults by greatly superior numbers.

In their stupendous efforts against La Vacquerie the Germans swept forward in dense waves with absolute recklessness, and were slaughtered.

During the afternoon they delivered a very heavy attack also west of Masnieres and succeeded in smashing through the British line, but an immediate counter-attack forced them to fall back.

The open fighting which has developed since the new [illegible] front has created an entirely new situation, which holds out many possibilities, and now, more than ever, involves the question of generalship which may decide the issue.

AID FROM RUSSIAN FRONT

The small gains the enemy has achieved, as has been stated, were discounted by the terrible cost to him in lives.

Germans were collected from the eastern theatre and various parts of the German line in the west. At La Vacquerie the enemy fought his way through the town, and one party penetrated for some hundred yards into British territory. This was the extreme gain. The attacking forces secured a very narrow strip of ground a little north and south of La Vacquerie, but the British still cling actually to the high ground north of this place.

The British commander voluntarily pulled back his line to the west and southwest of Masnieres to make it firmer. This morning the British line was near the western part of Marcoing, [illegible], but included Marcoing, a small triangular piece of territory, therefore, has been sacrificed by the British.

RUSHING UP DIVISIONS.

London Cable — Germany's counter-offensive west of Cambrai is at a stand-still following one of the bitterest struggles of the war. Rupprecht's troops have been mowed down in such alarming numbers by the deadly British fire that a lull in the fighting was to be expected today. The achievement of the British arms goes beyond the mere repulse of the strongest German west front attack of many months. It is reflected more clearly in the terrific losses inflicted on the onrushing enemy, who defied all rules of warfare in a desperate attempt to wrest from the British the fruits of Byng's great victory.

But indications are not lacking that the Germans still cherish hopes of breaking the British salient west of Cambrai. Although latest reports state that the fighting is confined to terrific artillery duels, the enemy is known to be rushing up fresh divisions in one last attempt to break through. These new troops will relieve a German army close to the point of exhaustion from the unrelenting British fire.

Meanwhile the British left flank remains intact, according to all reports from British headquarters, but on the eastern front between Bourlon Wood and Bonavy, Masnieres has been given up, and Berlin to-night claims a part of Marcoing at the point where the salient is sharpest. While the southern flank is badly bent in, Baden troops are in full possession of La Vacquerie, and fighting still continues near Gonzeaucourt behind the original British line.

Five hundred additional prisoners are claimed to-night by Berlin, while a semi-official statement here describes their total of 4,500 prisoners as excessive, but admits that a certain number were lost through the surprise attack, which started Friday.

The British are still confident of their ability to maintain most of their original gains and hold the newly-acquired salient. London continues to believe that the possession of this important ground near Cambrai will result in a German withdrawal from the Queant-Drocourt switch line, a withdrawal which is inevitable if the British continue to hold their present gains.

GERMAN IMAGINATION.

Field Marshal Haig has not reported any fighting in the Ypres salient recently, and an authority said to-night that the situation there is quiet at present. Nevertheless, Berlin to-day reports that violent fighting between Poelcapelle and Gheluvelt was followed by English infantry attacks in many waves north of the latter position, and that the British forces were thrown back by German fire and counter-attacks.

Gheluvelt is the place where the Germans constantly imagine that British attacks are being made. The need to repulse daily imaginary advances here, when Haig was attacking the ridge positions further north last fall, [illegible] either they have got a commander there with a powerful imagination, or Haig does not consider the action worth mentioning.

The Teuton imagination also pictures its enemy using the same fighting tactics as Prince Rupprecht in the battle of Cambrai, where the German troops advanced in waves, with the old tactics [illegible]. It is rather difficult to believe that Haig would resort to this mode of fighting in the [illegible] sector, with the [illegible] of the allies [illegible] in the Cambrai region.

The British have learned [illegible] can be accomplished [illegible] the infantry [illegible] the enemy lines [illegible] the casualties. In any event, [illegible] curious [illegible] the Germans [illegible] attribute to them the same tactics that have met with such ghastly failure for Prince Rupprecht.

Scarcely more than [illegible] additional [illegible] can be expected of the Germans west of Cambrai. Their forces have been tremendously depleted, and the army is worn and tired from facing the powerful British drive. If the fresh divisions are from the Russian front they will get a taste of artillery fire that has been strikingly lacking in the East in many a day, and although they have had a long rest in the quiet sector they will hardly be able to make any better impression on the British salient than the original west-front troops, who have already been tried before the British fire.

BRITISH REPORT.

London Cable — The report from Field Marshal Haig's headquarters to-night says: "During the day concentrations of hostile infantry east of Gonzeaucourt and in the neighborhood of Mocuvres were broken up by our artillery before any attack could develop.

"The enemy's artillery has been active in the neighborhood of La Vacquerie, and there has also been considerable hostile artillery activity north of Armentieres, southeast of Ypres and in the Passchendaele sector."

WOULD RENEW ITALIAN DRIVE

Huns Planning for Another Assault.

Allied Forces There Are Preparing.

Rome Cable — Italian troops, reinforced by large numbers of British and French fighting units, are holding the Piave line and are preparing for an Austro-German attack of almost unprecedented fury. It is believed that renewed attacks by the enemy along the entire front are inevitable, since there are unmistakable indications that the attempt to break through at any cost has not been renounced.

The German high command evidently has determined to continue the offensive throughout the Winter, relying upon its superiority in artillery. Apparently it has made no allowance for the numbers of guns brought up by the allies. For the present the efforts of the allies probably will be concentrated upon holding the present positions, which will be the starting points for an offensive movement in the near future.

Reliable information says that in addition to a general amnesty to all Italians now abroad an Italian-American agreement has been concluded with the object of facilitating the repatriation of Italian immigrants in the United States. There are half a million of these who are liable to military service. The majority are believed to have disobeyed the summons to the colors owing to the difficulty of transportation and the expenses attendant thereon.

ITALIAN REPORT.

Rome Cable — The official announcement from general headquarters Tuesday says:

"In the Giudicaria region (Trentino front) at dawn yesterday enemy parties, after artillery preparation, attacked our advanced line on the slopes south of Daone Valley, but were repulsed.

"On the Asiago plateau the enemy artillery was very active between Monte Sisemol and Monte Castelgomberto. Our reconnaissance parties brought back prisoners, and our batteries made powerful concentrations of fire on masses of troops seen in Gallio Wood, at the south-west of Asiago, and north of Monte Tondarecar. Enemy troops and encampments were also bombarded by our aircraft in Galmara Valley and neighboring zones.

"An enemy infantry attempt east of Monte Badenecche was promptly stopped by our fire. Between the Brenta and the Piave, on Monte Spinuccia, a few prisoners were captured in a brief action.

"Enemy columns moving upon Seren Valley and to the Piave Valley for the purpose of approaching the front were shelled and stopped by our batteries. On the Piave there was moderate artillery activity. Two captive balloons were brought down."

A LONG WAR.

Huysmans Says Huns Have Not Materials.

Stockholm Cable — Camille Huysmans, secretary of the Socialist International, who is now in Gothenburg, according to an interview printed in the Afton Tidningen, deplores events in Russia as making the peace outlook darker. Even if Germany could withdraw all her troops from the eastern front, he says, she would still lack the material superiority necessary to overcome the resistance of the Allies. Therefore, he concludes the war is likely to be prolonged for months because of the recent happenings in Russia.

M. Huysmans, who is on the way to Holland, is the bearer of a British report to the Dutch-Scandinavian Committee regarding German atrocities in Serbia. He declared, according to the Afton Tidningen, that the report was of such a nature that it would [illegible] of indignation [illegible] the whole world.

ALLIES TALK OF MAN POWER

London Cable — Consideration of the question of man power for the prosecution of the war was one of the important matters taken up by the inter-Allied conference in Paris, it became known to-day, when the official summary of the results of the conference was made public.

In the permanent committee which will handle this problem the United States will be represented, it having been decided by the conference that the United States should appoint delegates to participate in the deliberations of the committee.

BRITISH LINE CAN STAND OFF GERMAN BLOWS

Is Very Strongly Held, and Backed by Many New Batteries.

TWO ATTACKS

On the Cambrai Front Were Repulsed Wednesday Morning.

With the British Army in France, Cable — There is no indication that Gen. von der Marwitz's great offensive has been abandoned, and the presence of further fresh infantry divisions in the Cambrai area shows that the enemy has not yet lost hope of inflicting a sharp defeat on the British. The British line is now very strongly held, and can withstand any sledge-hammer pressure, and the anxiety—the natural effect of the first two days' onslaught—has been followed by a feeling of cheerfulness and complete confidence.

The number of British batteries has been greatly increased, and their accurate counter-shelling of the enemy's strong artillery groups east of the Scheldt has effectively reduced their activity.

The British airmen in clear weather continue to completely dominate the German aircraft, and bomb marching infantry and towns which have become new rail-heads.

The Germans to-day were still holding their hands along most of the new front. The fighting was in progress around a fortified farm, north of Havrincourt, after an enemy attack in the morning, but no other offensive developed against the British line up to noon.

There had been rumors of an attack south of Marcoing, but it did not materialize. It is possible that it has been postponed because of the heavy casualties suffered by Von Hindenburg's forces Monday.

The Germans doubtless hope to push back the British line and recapture the front between La Vacquerie and Marcoing. The sharp salient which Gen. Byng is holding about Bourlon Wood has given rise to interesting military problems. The British have held this line against repeated heavy attacks, but there is no gainsaying the fact that it is a difficult position to maintain, and it is considered that the British front would be considerably stronger without it.

The wood is filled with pools of water, over which the gas from shells hangs sometimes for twenty four hours. In addition, the German guns are able to reach it from many directions owing to the bend in the line.

There is an interesting report that a few British cavalry actually entered the town of Cambrai at the beginning of Gen. Byng's offensive. They were in small numbers, however, and were withdrawn immediately, as they were far in advance of the main body. The enemy has brought in two fresh divisions to the Marcoing area.

HAIG'S REPORT.

London Cable — The official report from Field Marshal Haig's headquarters to-night says: "On the Cambrai battle-front two minor attacks attempted by the enemy during the morning in the neighborhood of Gonnelieu were successfully repulsed. Local fighting also took place this morning to our advantage in the neighborhood of La Vacquerie. Early in the afternoon a more serious attack was delivered by the enemy in this area in considerable force; it was repulsed after severe fighting. Hostile infantry advancing to attack in the neighborhood of Bourlon Wood and Moeuvres was engaged and repulsed by our artillery.

"On the Ypres front the hostile infantry has been active this afternoon north of the Menin road.

"We have improved our positions slightly in this area and repulsed an enemy reconnoitring party."

AIRMEN BUSY ABOUT CAMBRAI

Villages Nearby Held by the Enemy Bombed.

Planes Also Cooperate With Infantry.

London Cable — The text of the official communication dealing with aviation issued tonight follows: "A great deal of reconnaissance, artillery and photographic work was carried out by our aeroplanes Monday.

"Villages in the occupation of the enemy on the Cambrai battle front were attacked with bombs and by machine gun fire from the air. Our aeroplanes also cooperated with the infantry in local fighting east of Ypres.

"During the night 22 bombs were dropped on villages west of Cambrai, some of the pilots engaged in this work making as many as three consecutive trips.

"In air fighting two hostile machines were driven down out of control. Two of our machines are missing."

CLIP THIS AND PIN ON WIFE'S DRESSER

Cincinnati man tells how to shrivel up corns or calluses so they lift off with fingers.

Ouch ! ! ! ! ! ! This kind of rough talk will be heard less here in town if people troubled with corns will follow the simple advice of this Cincinnati authority, who claims that a few drops of a drug called freezone when applied to a tender, aching corn or hardened callus stops soreness at once, and soon the corn or callus dries up and lifts right off without pain.

He says freezone dries immediately and never inflames or even irritates the surrounding skin. A small bottle of freezone will cost very little at any drug store, but will positively remove every hard or soft corn or callus from one's feet. Millions of American women will welcome this announcement since the inauguration of the high heels. If your druggist doesn't have freezone tell him to order a small bottle for you.

The Beast and the Child

(By Ella Wheeler Wilcox)

If in a neighbour's yard you saw
A vicious beast grown wild,
And if you heard the frightened cry
Of some death marked child,
Would you pass by without a sign
And say "It's no affair of mine",
Or would you get your gun?
The world is now our neighbour's yard,
And there the wild beast roams;
And all the children of the earth
Are menaced in their homes
Would you go culling summer flowers
And say "It's no affair of ours",
Or will you get your gun?

Corp John Hamilton,
Paisley Soldier, Killed

The following from The Paisley Advocate, will be of interest to Times readers:

"Corp. John Hamilton, was the only son of Mr. John Hamilton, and was 23 years of age. After leaving school he was employed for a number of years in the butcher shops of Messrs. McGregor and Oliather. He was bright and active in disposition, cheery and friendly with everyone. He enlisted two years ago this month in Toronto, went overseas the following January, and crossed over to France in July of 1916. He adopted himself so well to the work of the artillery that he was awarded stripes and became officer of a "sub" section of the battery. He was killed November 10th

In the last letter received from him, dated October 23rd, the deceased told of meeting with Alex Blue, Sam Tooke and Fin Hepburn, also his cousin Meredith Heany. The last named was among the wounded on the same date.

The bereaved father and three sisters have the sincere sympathy of all. The mother of deceased died three years ago.

The following letter tells the brief story of how Corp. Hamilton met instant death while in action with his battery of artillery:

Belgium, Nov. 12th. 1917

DEAR MR. HAMILTON—It is rather hard for me to write a letter of condolence to you on the death of your son, Corp. J. L. Hamilton, but thought you might be anxious to learn how it happened. We were all very sorry to lose him, as he was a bright, cheerful chap, and certainly on the way to further promotion. He died at the guns from the effects of an enemy shell. He never suffered a moment. We buried the body yesterday, a number of his comrades attending the funeral, after which our two trumpeters sounded the "Last Post." A large cross will be erected over the grave, which is registered, and of which you will no doubt receive particulars. Any further information I can give you do not hesitate to ask for. Again expressing my sorrow at your great loss, believe me.

Sincerely,
W. J. BRADSHAW, Lieut.
30th Battery, C. F. A.

Hugh Clarke,
Unionist, Elected

North Bruce elected the Unionist candidate by an overwhelming majority on Monday. The figures are nearly 1000 and with the soldiers' votes to come, this will go considerably over the thousand mark, probably 1300.

The efforts of the Laurier stumpers to make the contest one of politics failed, at least so far as the voter was concerned, for in a riding with Liberal leanings the returns prove abundantly that the voters had in mind a bigger issue than that of love for the candidates or of politics.

While The Times has not been able to get the exact figures of each subdivision the majorities are:

For Clark—St. Edmunds 37, Eastnor 88, Albermarle 4, Amabel 133, Hepworth 39, Kincardine Tp. 45, Arran 245, Southampton 203, Port Elgin 44, Wiarton 32, Kincardine 176, Tara 78. Total of majorities 1150. Against this were majorities for McAulay as follows:—Saugeen 45, Bruce 120, Tiverton 38. Total of majorities 203. This would leave a total majority for Clark over all of 947 Of course the soldiers' vote is still to be added. Lindsay gave Tolmie 4 last election, and 25 for Clark this time.

In Saugeen in 1911 election it gave 94 Tolmie, while Bruce Tp. gave a majority of 220. It will be seen that the farming districts polled fairly for Union this time. Tiverton was the only place where Laurier increased. In 1910 it was 31 for him. This time it was 38.

In Port Elgin all the vote was polled, There were 124 women on the list, and all voted but 4, who were out of town. There were no spoiled ballots at Mr. Busby's poll, while there were only two at Mr. Hilker's. This is certainly to the credit of the new voters

One lady voter was challenged by the Unionists on the grounds of not having lived in the province for one year. Otherwise the proceedings passed off quietly.

For further election results turn to to page 5.

"He That Loseth His Life For My Sake Shall Save It"

Of letters received from the front few if any have been more affecting than the one recently received by Mrs. Angus McLean of Toronto, from her son Percy, written after his brother George had fallen. These soldiers are nephews of the MacKay boys at Underwood. Following is the letter:

"Dearest Mother and All: I have just heard the sad news that poor George has been killed in action. One of the guns of his battery (the 30th) was put out of action, but George was the only man killed outright. This is an awful blow, mother dear, but we must be brave and patient, as the war seems to be satisfied with nothing less than universal sacrifice. The "kid" was such a fine boy—so honest, frank, and straightforward—and although my brother, I want to say that I have yet to meet a finer type of manhood. It breaks my heart to think how hard this shock will fall upon you at home, and, God knows, it is hard for me out here; but we must all derive our comfort from the one source, remembering those wonderfully true words: "He that loseth his life for My sake shall save it unto life eternal." I am so glad to have seen him again up here, as he called just the night before last with Ern Rock, and we had a lovely chat together—all so bright and cheery. How I would love to see you all and tell you something of the glory of a death on the field of battle, because after all, dear parents, brother and sisters one should be proud to give his life in this struggle of struggles. Poor dad, poor mother and kiddies, may God be with you all and may you feel around you His everlasting arms. Sorrowful but not cast down, your big boy, Percy S. McLean."

Both the writer and his fallen brother were members of Victoria Presbyterian Church Toronto, upon the large honor roll of which their names are inscribed

Women Organize

The library auditorium was filled with ladies on Friday night to hear Mrs. McIntyre, of Toronto, who spoke in the interest of the Union government.

Mrs. Munro occupied the chair, and made a most capable presiding officer. In introducing the speakers Mrs. Munro, who has two sons at the front, said it was the fact that the leading Liberals and Conservatives had united for carrying on the war that she felt it her duty to assist in every way the union idea.

Mrs McIntyre, in a brief, but convincing way outlined the plan of the most active men of both parties in an effort to serve Canada be union until the end of the war. She touched upon all the issues in which women were concerned.

After the address the ladies were asked to form a citizen's committee. Women generally are to have the franchise, and it would be necessary to have organizations through which women could give expression on the various public question. Also to take part in the municipal affairs. Finally a committee was appointed to nominate officers and formulate a citizens' committee. The committee were: Mrs. Munro, Mrs. Hervey, Mrs. Thomson, Mrs. Wismer, Mrs. Crawford, Mrs. Saylor.

During the evening a number of ladies volunteered to act as scrutineers and to see that the woman vote was polled on election day.

Should Be Cheerful

Toronto Dec. 8/17

To the Editor of The Times

Dear Sir:—

Reading a copy of the Port Elgin Times dated Nov. 28th I noticed a letter signed by a "Subscriber" censoring a show by the "Marks Bros", showed in your town. The subscriber thought it was wrong to pay 50c for the privilege of spending an enjoyable evening, and thinks that Marks Bros are not doing a patriotic work

Did that subscriber never hear the soldiers' song "Keep the Home Fires Burning" or any others? Does he think that the soldiers in the trenches like to fancy his folks at home doing nothing but weeping. Any soldier will tell you the same, that he likes to think of a cheery, lively home to return to after the war. And as far as the 50c for a seat, I think that there is lots of money spent more foolishly

Hoping you will be good enough to find space to publish this letter and congratulating you on a breezy little paper.

I remain yours,
A Faithful Reader

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON XII.

December 23, 1917.

Preparation for the Messiah—Christmas Lesson—Malachi 3: 1-12.

Commentary.—I. The Messenger of the Messiah (v. 1). 1. I—God himself is the speaker. He answers the question recorded in the last verse of the preceding chapter. will send my messenger—God's messenger, to whom reference is here made, is John the Baptist, as is clearly shown by our Lord himself (Matt. 11:10, 11; Mark 1:2-4; Luke 1: 76; 7: 24-28). shall prepare the way—It was anciently the custom to make great preparations for the approach of a royal personage. Hills were graded down, valleys were filled and crooked roads were straightened, that the way might be attractive and easily passable. See Isa. 40: 3, 4. before me—God here speaks of himself in the third person. the Lord—God changes his form of address and speaks of himself in the third person. whom ye seek—The Jews were expecting the Messiah to come. shall suddenly come to his temple—"The Lord" would come unexpectedly or in an unexpected manner, and he would come as Lord of the temple at Jerusalem, or as he who had full right to control all the spiritual interests of the chosen nation. the messenger of the covenant—The Messiah is here called "the messenger of the covenant" since he would fulfil God's promise.

II. The Mission of the Messiah (vs. 2-6). 2. who may abide the day of his coming—The Messiah, infinitely holy and just, would put to shame and condemn the ungodly. To receive him would mean the putting way of all iniquity. like a refiner's fire—The refiner's fire was used to separate impurities from the metal. fullers' soap—An alkaline substance in the form of lye, secured by filtering water through ashes, was used to cleanse cloth. This is spoken of as "fullers' soap." The fuller was the one who washed the cloth and thickened it by diminishing it in length and breadth. The work of the Messiah would be to purify the hearts of the people. 3. as a refiner.... of silver—Reference is here made to the work of those who obtain pure silver from the ore. The refiner places the metal in the crucible and melts it He watches it closely and notes the instant when the dross is all consumed and only the pure silver remains. In the atonement provision is made for the complete cleansing of the nature. purify the sons of Levi—The priests had become corrupt and it was necessary that they should be purified if they would "offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness." 4. offering of Judah and Jerusalem—The offering made by the Jews as representative of all who would receive the Messiah. pleasant unto the Lord—Acceptable to Jehovah. as in former years—"As in ancient years."—R. V. he prophet looks backward to the time when God's people, including the priests, were obedient and trustful. God's true people now offer to him the sacrifice of praise and devotion in a spirit of faith. 5. I will come near to you to judgment—The Messenger, Christ, would come to condemn the guilty and to commend the righteous. He would not overlook those who were guilty of the acts which are specified in this verse. The sins here mentioned were common in the time of the prophet and in succeeding ages. sorcerers—This term includes all who claimed to have power over evil spirits or to be able to foretell future events or to consult the dead. oppress—The Lord takes note of those who oppress the wage earner, the widow, the orphan and the stranger, and will bring just punishment upon them These classes are looked upon by the greedy as lawful prey, but God has special regard for them. 6. I, Jehovah, change not (R. V.)—However much the people of Judah had changed, Jehovah had not changed.

III. Stern rebukes to Judah (vs. 7-9). 7. from the days of your fathers—An indefinite expression which indicates remote past time. gone away from mine ordinances—For generations the people of Israel had been disobedient and rebellious. "I am not changed from good; ye are not changed from evil. I am unchangeable in holiness; ye are unchangeable in perversity." Return unto me, and I will return unto you—There is a depth of affection and mercy couched in these words. Jehovah was yearning over his erring people. He would receive them graciously if they would only depart from iniquity and come to him. Saith the Lord of Hosts—These words add much weight to the promise which they follow. wherein shall we return—The people are represented as satisfied that they had been doing what they ought. They seemed be unaware of the fact that they had gone far away from the Lord. 8. will a man rob God—Is it possible that a human being, one made in the image of God, would defraud his Maker, to whom he owes all he has? Jehovah is answering the question. "Wherein shall we return?" Yet ye have robbed me—The charge is pointed and strong. Wherein—The guilty people demand an explanation. In tithes and offerings—The people of Judah had withheld the sums which they should have paid into the treasury of the Lord. The tithe is the tenth. The scriptures show that two tenths, or tithes, of the produce of the fields and of the increase of the flocks were required of the Israelites for the support of the Levites, the temple worship and the poor. These tithes were in addition to the offerings for sacrifice. 9. Ye are cursed with a curse—The inspired prophet records the fact that because the people had disobeyed the Lord and had been withholding from him tithes and offerings, a curse was resting upon them.

IV. Gracious promises (vs. 10-12). 10. Bring ye all the tithes—The way to escape from the curse that was resting upon the people was to begin at once to obey the Lord. If they should do this, they would accomplish two things. They would be relieved of condemnation for their neglect, and there would be ample provision made for carrying on the temple service. This would be a test of their interest in spiritual things. Prove me—They were called upon to bring in the tithes and offerings, and to do it in faith. They were invited to put God to the test. Open you the windows of heaven—This is a strong expression indicating the magnitude of the blessing which God was waiting to "pour out" on his obedient, believing people. A blessing—The blessing would include God's favor, satisfaction and joy; and there would be increased fruitfulness in the fields and flocks, for the windows of heaven would be opened to pour out rain upon the land. 11. I will rebuke the devourer—The Lord promised to hold in check all the agencies that would naturally destroy the increase of the fields. 12. All nations shall call you blessed—If Judah would fully obey Jehovah, their prosperity would be so great as to attract the attention of surrounding nations.

Questions—Who was the writer of this lesson? When did he write? Of what messenger does he tell us in v. 1? For whose coming was he to prepare the way? What work was the Messiah to accomplish? Where was Christ born? In what sense would he be like a refiner of silver? How had the people of Malachi's time been robbing God? What is meant by tithes and offerings? What were the people called to do?

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic—A message for the times.

I. Pronouncing judgment against sin.

II. Offering incentive to repentance.

I. Pronouncing judgment against sin. The various aspects under which the Messiah was presented by the prophets bear distinct relation to the immediate needs of the people to whom the message was given. Malachi presented him as the Refiner to a people who were in a state of moral and religious degradation. A proud and self-righteous pharisaism had supplanted all true spirituality of worship. Attention even to the outward forms of piety had become a little better than a name. The depth of wickedness portrayed by Malachi was very naturally followed by a divine threatening against the workers of iniquity by him whose eternal supremacy, absolute knowledge, inflexible justice and spotless holiness constitute him Judge of all. On account of a careless and irreligious spirit among the people, God's blessing had been withheld and Israel was smitten with a curse. Their sufferings as a people were self-imposed. The unbelieving priests of Malachi's time ventured the complaint that they could see no tokens of the presence of God among his people. The people declared it a vain thing to serve God. As a result and as a mark of national decay the hearts of the children were alienated from the parents. Neglect of the divine ordinances and decay of spiritual life bore their fruit in the time when Malachi delivered his messages. The Jewish people anxiously looked forward to Messiah's coming, but they greatly mistook its object. They little thought what a searcher of hearts and corrector of wrongs he would be. They thought themselves ready for his coming. The prophet Malachi saw them to be self-deceived. To prepare them for the coming Messiah a faithful herald in John the Baptist was sent. He aroused the attention, awakened consciences, announced the nearness of the Messiah's approach, proclaimed his reign, convinced of sin and showed the people that they stood in need of a much greater salvation than deliverance from the Roman yoke. Malachi's message announced the Messiah as one who should begin a great purifying among the people of Israel. The illustration furnishes a beautiful figure of the plans and purposes of God in Christ Jesus, God over all, watching all, guiding all with untiring love and patience from generation to generation in a refining process to bring man into a state of purity and likeness to himself. Through the prophet God called the Jewish nation to a recollection of their transgressions and particularly with regard to God's own ordinances. His requirements were disregarded, his rights resisted, the demands and interests of his kingdom were neglected. Such robbery of God proceeded from failure to acknowledge the great fact of God's sovereignty.

II. Offering incentive to repentance The event announced by the prophet was the appearance of that great Deliverer who had for many ages been the hope of Israel. He is described as the everlasting God, the Jehovah of the Israelites. The long twilight of figure and type was about to be succeeded by the clear day of spiritual religion. It was the purpose of Malachi to arouse the conscience of the different classes of the people and to tell them to consider seriously their national, religious and domestic duties. He presented an ideal future as an incentive for present action. Jewish history abounded with examples that might have improved and instructed the degenerate age in which Malachi lived. The "days of old" were full of divine revelations. God's faithfulness, mercy and truth were written unmistakably on those wondrous days. Through his prophet Malachi Jehovah sent a message of affectionate compassion to his ancient people. It was also a solemn charge and call to a backsliding people to return with a fixed purpose in all things to conform to God's will. They were called to reflect upon their waywardness and to yield to the divine entreaties. In God's return to them was implied all spiritual blessedness. All wanderings were to be forgiven. Springs of deep and immortal happiness were to be opened within their souls. Prosperity, honor an happiness were the blessings which should follow true repentance. Israel had a golden opportunity to regain all she had lost.

All morns may be like Christmas morn
To him who looks for them,
And daily is the Christ Child born
In some new Bethlehem.

Who walks with faith and quiet will
Through unknown ways and dim,
Who keeps his heart a child's heart still
The Christ Child dwells with him.

For him the heavens are made anew,
Lit by a guiding star,
With singing angels surging through
From hierarchs afar.

A new earth at his feet shall spring,
With love and life astir;
With shepherds and wise kings who bring
Gold, frankincense and myrrh.

His ears shall hear, his eyes shall see
The angels and the kings,
If but his heart a manger be
Where Love her best-born brings.
—ROBERT GILBERT WELSH.

Prophetic

These lines were found among the papers left by Lieut. Leo Buchanan, B.A., LL.B. They were written in England shortly before he crossed to France. A few weeks later he was killed in action at St. Eloi on April 19th, 1916.—Toronto Universal Monthly.

A moment now to say "good-bye,"
The bugles fling their piercing cry;
"Fall in; fall in," a thousand feet,
Tramp to their places in the street.

A moment fleet as flash of swords,
Time for a dozen grasping words—
Yet I shall live it o'er and o'er,
In silent watch and battle roar.

Give me your hand—and may I choose,
A guerdon for the things I lose;
'Twould be that from your inmost heart,
My image may not quite depart.

So when 'in storm, and dark and cold,
A thousand leagues away we hold
Our solemn watch in pits of dread,
Where lie entombed the myriad dead.

That I may hold a solemn faith,
That when across your eyes, a wraith,
My face appears—a shade of fear,
Brings to your eyes an unshed tear.

That when they tell a thousand tales
Of war, your cheek a little pales,
And that you scan with pause of breath,
The narrow print of deeds and death.

For me, and if my name is there,
And you should find a record fair,
That you will pause and turn aside,
And know a more than foolish pride.

Some day you'll hear the thrilling strain,
"Fall in," for those who come again.
If I am left on Flander's coast
For me in echo, the "Last Post."

The moment's past, again good-bye,
The bugles fling their piercing cry,
"Fall in, Fall in," a thousand feet,
Tramp to their places in the street.

A Yuletide Home-Coming

(By Charles McCabe.)

The club looked just the very thing Gerald Mannersley was craving for—a sense of home.

A few lines read accidentally in an out-of-date newspaper had made him restless with longing for the old scenes. And so he had traveled two days and nights in a sleeper, vaguely connecting his journey's end with all the love and friendship his starved nature was demanding.

When he arrived at his old club on a chill, grey Christmas morning, it was only to find that fifteen years' silent absence had been too severe a test for friendship. The place was empty of all but servants, and they were strange, unwelcome faces.

He stood at the club window, looking out in the desolate, deserted street which he had always remembered as being thronged, and a great sadness swept over him.

This was not what he wanted. From his pocket he drew out the scrap of paper which had really brought him so many miles, and looked at it bitterly. It was only a death announcement cut from a paper of a year ago, and ran in the usual way—"Michael Townley, at his residence," etc.

In fancy he saw a sweet-faced maiden who sought her happiness only in the eyes of the youth by her side. There were joybells there, too, as they left the church with the fragrance of mutual love about them.

The bells pealed on outside, and willing fancy led him still further into the realm of "might have been."

In an instant he made up his mind to visit once more the old-fashioned cottage not many miles away, to which he had hoped fifteen years before to take a bride. He would go and see it, even if its neglected condition only added to his loneliness and pain.

Two hours later he was striding through the crisp country air along a winding path which led to a rambling, ivy-covered cottage.

As the last turn brought him in sight of the house he stopped in surprise. He had expected to see dirt, ruin and decay. But instead he looked upon a trim, well-kept cottage, and a soft crooning song in a voice which reawakened the tender memories of long ago, came floating through the unlatched door.

Half believing that it must be fancy leading him still, he entered the house softly, and following the voice went into the inner room, and stood in the glow of the warm firelight.

The sweet, tired-faced, middle-aged singer turned as his shadow fell across the light, and then stood white and trembling.

"Gerald!" she whispered. "Gerald have you come to reproach me? Not to-day! Not to-day"

The strong man's voice broke as he held out his arms.

"Nance" he cried, joyfully.

In a moment she was crushed, sobbing, to his reast.

"Oh, Gerald, is it really you? God is very good. I thought you must be dead."

For several moments they stood thus, the strong man's tears falling on her gray tinged hair. Then he gently pushed her into a chair.

"You are not alone?" he asked, as his eyes caught sight of a little table laid for two, daintily spread with Christmas fare.

"Yes," she answered. "I am quite alone. I have often come down here."

"But you are expecting somebody?" he said, calling attention to the table.

She flushed prettily, looking almost as young as she had in his dreams of the morning, as she replied:

"I was expecting you, Gerald"

He smiled happily at her; then the smile faded, and he sighed as he sank into a chair.

"This is all foolishness, Nance," he said, sadly. "You could not live here in the old days, you could do so less now, and I could not live here on another man's thousands."

A smile hovered over the woman's face as she flitted here and there, busily preparing things for a meal. Then she slipped behind a chair, and leaning over whispered with burning cheeks:

"Perhaps you do not know, Gerald, that Mr. Townsley's money goes back to his family if—if I marry again."

The man sprang to his feet and to his family if I marry again."

"It is not too late," he cried. "We are still young. Will you let me try to make you happy?"

Her answer was drowned in the burst of Christmas bells that pealed from the village church close by. But he did not need her words; he could see her eyes.

Christmas Feasts

Many curious feasts arose in connection with the celebration of Christmas in early days. Thus, the ass on which Balaam rode in the "Helms Mystery" won for the feast the title "Festum Asinorum," the Feast of the Asses. As it was celebrated in France, according to William Hone, it consisted almost entirely of dramatic show. On one occasion the clergy walked on Christmas Day in procession, [illegible] to represent the prophets and other characters.

"Moses appeared in an alb and cope, with a long beard and a [illegible]. David had a green vestment. Balaam, with an immense pair of spurs, rode on a wooden ass which enclosed a speaker. There were also six Jews and six Gentiles. Among other characters the poet Virgil was introduced, singing monkish rhymes, as a Gentile prophet and a translater of the sibylline oracles. They thus moved in procession through the body of the church chanting versicles and conversing on the nativity and kingdom of Christ till they came into the choir.

"This service, as performed in the cathedral at Rouen, commenced with a procession in which the clergy represented the prophets of the Old Testament who foretold the birth of Christ; then followed Balaam mounted on the ass, Zacharias, Elizabeth, John the Baptist, the Sibyl, Erythree, Simeon, Virgil, Nebuchadnezzar and the three musicians in the furnace. After the procession entered the cathedral several groups of persons performed the parts of Jews and Gentiles to whom the choristers addressed speeches; afterward they called on the prophets, one by one, who came forward successively and delivered a passage relative to the Messiah. The other characters advanced to occupy their proper situations and reply to the questions of the choristers. They performed the miracle of the furnace; Nebuchadnezzar spoke, the Sibyl appeared and then an anthem was sung, which concluded the ceremony.

"The Missal of an Archbishop of Sens' indicates that during such a service the animal itself, clad with precious priestly ornaments, was solemnly conducted to the middle of the choir, during which procession a hymn in praise of the ass was sung, ending with:—

'Amen, bray, most honored Ass,
Sated now with grain and grass;
Amen' repeat, amen reply,
And disregard antiquity.
Hez va! hez va! hez va! heze!"

The service lasted the whole of a night and part of the next day, and formed altogether the strangest, most ridiculous medley of whatever was usually sung at church festivals When the choristers were thirsty wine was served; in the evening, on a platform before the church lit by an enormous lantern, the grand chanter of Sens led a jolly band in performing broadly indecorous interludes. At respective divisions of the service the ass was supplied with drink and provender.

Christmas Trees

From Time Immemorial Part of the Holiday Celebration.

From time immemorial a tree has been a part of the Christmas celebration. It may be seen outside the traditional mangers in the missals and early paintings of the preraphaelite Italian school. In the tree or near it are seen angels in flowing robes singing out of a scroll of illuminated paper the "Peace on Earth and Good Will Toward Men" or "Glory, Glory, Hallelujah!"

The correct German Christmas tree always has an angel or a Christkind on the topmost branch, with a tinsel star at the end of a staff, like a pantomime fairy, and if the tree belongs to a very orthodox family there is usually at its foot a small toy group representing the Saviour's birth in the stable of Bethlehem.

The lights on the tree are said to be of Jewish origin. In the ninth month of the Jewish year, corresponding nearly to our December, and on the twenty-fifth day, the Jews celebrated the feast of dedication of their temple. It had been desecrated on that day by Antiochus. It was dedicated by Judas Maccabeus, and then, according to the Jewish legend, sufficient oil was found in the temple to last for the seven branched candlestick for seven days, and it would have taken seven days to prepare new oil. Accordingly the Jews were wont on the 25th of Kisleu in every house to light a candle, on the next day two, and so on till on the seventh and last day of the feast seven candles twinkled in every house.

It is not easy to fix the exact date of the Nativity, but it is most probably on the last day of Kisleu, when every Jewish house in Bethlehem and Jerusalem was twinkling with lights. It is worthy of notice that the German name for Christmas is Weihnacht (the night of dedication), as though it were associated with this feast. The Greeks also call Christmas the feast of lights, and, indeed, this was also the name given to the dedication festival, Chanuka, by the Jews.—New York Mail and Express.

Popular Jokes.

The most popular joke which has been published in any language in the history of the world is stated to be that which appeared in an obscure corner of the Punch almanac for 1845. It reads: "Advice to persons about to marry—Don't!" It would be interesting to know who was its author. Another, founded on a similar subject, was the "Advice to persons who have 'fallen in love'—Fall out!" One of the most brilliant things that ever appeared in our contemporary was the brief dialogue between an inquiring child and his impatient parent: "What is mind?" "No matter." "What is matter?" "Never mind!"—Westminster Gazette.

You never can tell about strategy. Lots of shallow remarks are delivered in a deep voice.

Old Christmas Portents

If you will go to the crossroads between eleven and twelve on Christmas night you will hear what most concerns you in the coming year.

If on Christmas Eve you make a little heap of salt on the table, and it melts over night, you will die the next year; if, in the morning it remains undiminished, you will live.

If a shirt be spun, woven and sewed by a pure, chaste maiden on Christmas Day, it will be proof against lead or steel.

If you are born at sermon time on Christmas morning you can see spirits.

If you burn elder on Christmas Eve you will have revealed to you all the witches and sorcerers of the neighborhood.

If you eat a raw egg on Christmas morning, fasting, you can carry heavy weights.

It is unlucky to carry anything forth from the house on Christmas morning until something has been brought into it.

If the fire burns brightly on Christmas morning it betokens prosperity; if it smoulders, adversity.

A Yuletide Tragedy

When Josiah Gibbs found that his wife "had it in for him," as he called it, and had bought him a box of cigars for his Christmas present he grew wise and, with apparent sorrow, said to her:

"Now, isn't it too bad, my love? I discovered that cigar smoking was becoming so injurious to me that I have quit it and have to content myself with a few whiffs now and then on my pipe with mild tobacco. Now, isn't it too bad!"

"I'm so sorry, dear!" said Josiah Gibbs' wife. "But your friends will enjoy them, and I am sure that will please you."

Gibbs smiled grimly and, as his wife departed, winked knowingly at himself in the looking glass. And when he saw his friend Joe Spicer he told him how he had escaped his wife's Christmas cigars—Joe Spicer, the best judge of a good cigar that ever bit off the end of a two-for-a-half. And Joe smiled primly, too.

But every time Joe Spicer called at Gibbs', which was often—he was an old friend of Gibbs—he smoked one or more of Josiah's wife's Christmas cigars.

"Gallant and diplomatic of you, old man!" Gibbs would say to Spicer on opportunity and smile his knowing smile. And Joe would smile his.

And by and by the cigars were all smoked by Spicer, and Gibbs' wife was led to say to Gibbs:

"It's just a perfect shame, Josiah, that you couldn't take any pleasure in those cigars and that your friend Spicer should have had them all."

At which Josiah smiled his knowing smile and said:

"Oh, well, my love, never mind. Joe seemed to enjoy them."

"Yes, indeed!" said Josiah's wife, why shouldn't he?"

Which made Josiah smile more and more and almost cackle. But he said nothing.

"Yes, indeed," repeated Mrs. Gibbs, why shouldn't he? You know, Josiah, you told me that a woman should never choose cigars for a Christmas present to her husband, as a woman knows nothing about their quality, so I asked Joe Spicer, having heard you say so often what an excellent judge of a cigar he was, to select a box for me—the best he could get—and he did, and'"

Josiah Gibbs had instant business down at the office, where he tore his hair and flung his pipe and tobacco out of the window. And he passed Joe Spicer without bowing and without his knowing smile. But Joe still wore his.—Browning's Magazine.

Through Many Trials

"Get along with you!" she says, laughing delightedly: "you always came round me with your kisses since you were a little boy. I wonder you care to kiss an elderly woman like me, Dick, when there are so many pretty girls about. Who was that little girl down in Cornwall, Dick, you wicked fellow; you have got into Aunt Lilly's bad graces, I'm afraid!"

"What are you talking about, aunt?" he inquires, with a sudden hardness in his voice.

"Hark! Wasn't that a knock?" his aunt interrupts; "a double knock?"

"I heard nothing," Dick answers, carelessly. "It is a stormy night, sure enough, aunt. I think you have stormy nights down here pretty often; but for all that I should like to live here," he adds, smiling to himself with a recurrence of pleasant visions.

"Should you, Dick? And I am sure I should be glad—only too glad to have you live here," Miss Proude says, affectionately, but listening with a housekeeper's anxiety. "What a time Hennie is! Ring the bell near you, Dick, please. Why couldn't you manage to live with me, Dick, and go up to town every morning?" she asks, suddenly, as the brilliant idea occurs to her.

"Perhaps I shall one day, Aunt Jane," he says, smiling still. "Things may get better with me, aunt, eh? If I could get some decent berth at even three hundred a year, and be able to live in simple comfort," he says, musingly, with a wonderful light in his eyes and a glow in his face. "Would you make me welcome—if—I—would you make some one else welcome, too, aunt?"

His big heart is throbbing and his cheeks flushing like a schoolgirl at his own hopes as he asks the question, and Miss Proude, a good deal fluttered at the idea, and not in her heart of hearts delighted, makes answer in a rather uncertain tone, which Dick feels rather than hears.

"You mean—you mean—if you marry, Dick? You mean—you and your wife to live here?" she asks, coughing. "Of course, my dear boy, if — if that arrangement—if I could make you and her comfortable. I don't know anything about the young lady, you see. Goodness me! I must answer the door myself. Helena must have gone out for something. There's the knock again. Whoever can it be?"

"Miss Brown, perhaps," Dick suggests, rather spitefully, "seizing a golden opportunity to have an interview with me."

"Miss Brown never comes at this hour," Miss Proude says, rigidly. "She is always at home to dinner every evening of her life, unless when she goes out to a party!"

She utters these words half out of the room, and Dick, smiling sardonically, begins to button up his coat and look for his overcoat, as he hears the door opened, and a loud, delighted ejaculation in his aunt's voice, and in reply a few, merry laugh, and some words breathlessly uttered.

"Such an evening for you to be out, my dear!" he hears Miss Proude say, and he hurries on his overcoat.

"Some of aunt's gossips; I can't stay to be looked over and talked over now," he mutters, when the dining-room door opens, and Miss Proude's face, absolutely radiant as a full moon, and as cheerful and bright as the morning sun, beams in for an instant, and then disappears.

"Walk in, dear, I'll be with you in a minute," she says, with a sort of gasp, fairly suffocating with pleasant excitement and anticipation. "Oh! I must introduce you, though—my nephew, Richard Dumaresq — Miss Brown!"

And as Dick, startled and annoyed beyond measure at the encounter, looks up, flushing angrily, he thinks his keen sight deceives him; he thinks it must deceive him, though he knows of a surety that it is not so, as his gaze rests on the beautiful, frightened face shrinking back from the doorway, and the crimson flush that rises to his temples, recedes with the next beat of his pulses, leaving him ashy pale.

"Lady Petherick!" he says, in a shocked tone, stupefied into quietness.

Miss Proude waits but to hear the amazed exclamation of her nephew and to hear plainly the title prefixed to the name of her little known visitor, ere she disappears in a whirl of delight and gratification.

For, possessing no remarkable depth of discrimination, the good woman detects nothing untoward in the bearing of the persons she has been the means of so happily bringing together as she thinks. From Dick's unconcealable agitation and changes of color she augurs the happiest results, and "lady"—the surname she has not clearly heard in her rapturous gratification at discovering—"what I always suspected," she says, triumphantly, that the pseudo "Miss Brown" is among the noblest as well as the fairest in the land. The "titled lady," as the simple spinster calls her, evidently shares in Dick's embarrassment and emotion.

Dick is stricken with an angry dumbness, remembering what his aunt has just told him respecting her beautiful visitor; remembering the singular knowledge of all his affairs which Lady Petherick possesses; remembering the scene in the lamplit room, with the unwinking eyes of the sunflowers sion and aplomb in a moment.

"How astonished you look, Mr. Du- watching him from the satin draperies; remembering everything, he reddens with vexed shame for her as well as for himself; for Evelyn, with her lovely face a trifle paler than usual, and with a certain haggardness about her lips and eyes despite the bright smile has recovered her self-posses- maresq," she says, easily. "You didn't know that Miss Proude and I were old friends?"

"No, I never imagined that you and my aunt were acquainted, Miss Brown," he says, sardonically, but confronting her now with coolness equal to her own.

"That's right," she replies, suavely, smiling more brightly. "I would rather keep my incognito, only I am afraid you have let the cat out of the bag."

She seats herself by the table on a chair opposite to him, and draws off her gloves composedly. It may be that it is from an effort at composure, and the act is mechanical, for the long mousquetaire gloves draw off easily, and her pearly, fair hands are revealed, and delicate, satin-smooth fingers aglitter with three or four exquisite rings but as he detects in a moment, not the wedding ring.

"I shall say nothing farther to betray you incognito to my aunt," he answers, very coldly, buttoning up his overcoat and taking his hat and gloves. "What I did say was of course involuntary in my surprise, and before I learned your wishes on the subject."

"Very good! It doesn't matter in the least," Evelyn answers, lightly. "You are not hurrying away on my account, I hope?"

"I must go," he says, smiling slightly, and speaking very courteously and coldly. "My aunt must have the pleasure of your company quite to herself. My train goes in ten minutes, and it is quite seven minutes walk."

Lady Petherick looks up with a sort of terror in her eyes and voice.

"Ten minutes!" she exclaims; "I thought it was 8 o'clock. I must go—I dare not miss that train! I thought I had more than half an hour!"

"So you have, by the eight o'clock express, Lady Petherick," Dick retorts, calmly. "I travel third class by the ordinary train."

"Oh, I see," she says, drawing a long breath, and sinking back in her chair; "but is there any special reason, besides my presence, you must travel third-class by this ordinary train?"

"Yes, every reason," Dick answers rather doggedly.

"You can go by the next, not the express, if you like to escort me," she says, gently.

"You are very kind," Dick says equably; "but as I have probably lost this train, I will stay for the last—nine-thirty. Aunt Jane will be glad to have a chat with me."

"Of course she will," Evelyn says, sweetly; "and, by-the-bye, where is Aunt Jane? Down in the dear little kitchen or storeroom, I suppose, concocting some dainty dish for her dear nephew's supper," and she laughs so merrily and chats so pleasantly—with a gay girlishness, as well as a ladylike courtesy and kindness to Miss Proude, which, to her great disappointment, her nephew [illegible] her up-stairs—that Richard Dumaresq, for the twentieth time, believes, against his own judgment, that he is the victim of some chimera or mad fancy of his own brain.

But then very soon the time to go, looking such a slender, girlish form in her modest, demure garb of a dark ulster and tweed cap, with a thick lace veil, that Dumaresq—mentally calling himself a fool, an ass, a cad, and a nincompoop, and a variety of other agreeable names—rises to escort her as far as the railway station.

He can do no less. It is raining and blowing, and is the dreariest of wet October nights. She is [illegible] [illegible] there were no [illegible] or [illegible] on [illegible] to [illegible] his [illegible].

He bids his aunt "Good-by for the present," as he prepares to escort "Miss Brown"; and Miss Brown, kissing Aunt Jane very affectionately, whispers her an assurance that she will soon come again to see her.

There are but a few minutes to wait, and as they hurry into the station with dripping umbrellas, Lady Petherick, passing on through the booking-office, hands Dumaresq her purse.

"Get a ticket, please," she says, hastily, and going to the barrier, waits until he joins her, hands her ticket, which she shows, and, passing through, he follows her, muttering an explanation to the official about "seeing the lady off," which, rather to his surprise, the ticket-holder does not seem to expect or even hear, as he is attending to other passengers.

At the carriage door Dumaresq stops and it looks so cozy, the dark-blue, carpeted little chamber; lighted, warm, luxurious, he cannot but contrast it in his thoughts with the conveyance by which he must travel by-and-by—bare, hard, comfortless, in the company of mechanics, recruits, and a tipsy man or two.

"Well, what are you waiting for?" Evelyn inquires, smilingly.

"Waiting to see you off, I suppose," Dick answers, rather awkwardly.

"To see me off? Are you not coming too?" she asks, sharply, with an astonished expression. "I asked you for your escort, I think, if I mistake not?"

"Did you, Lady Petherick? I am very sorry, but indeed I did not understand you," he falters, growing very uncomfortable beneath the scornful reproach in her ladyship's face.

"Indeed?" she says, with cutting coldness and disbelief in her tones and her fair, haughty features. "Very well—adieu—and—stay—throw this ticket into the fire!"

"Your ticket, Lady Petherick?"

"Your ticket Mr. Dumaresq," she retorts, turning her shoulder to him. "When I ask friends to travel with me, to oblige me with the protection of their society, I am in the habit of placing the means of traveling at their disposal."

"You are very kind," Dick says, flushing deeply; "but I could have wished you had not laid me under such an obligation to you."

"You are making a fool of yourself now, and forgetting yourself, mon ami," she says, with rigid rebuke.

"I beg your pardon," Dick says again, feeling utterly mortified and humbled.

She makes use of him as her escort, as she had said, but never addresses a word to him, or apparently looks at him from where she leans against the blue cushioned corner by the opposite window, her dark lashes resting on her soft, pale pink cheek, her delicate profile in strong relief against the dark background. Dick cannot but look at her, cannot but admire her. He thinks it is because she is so like Imogene in the soft, pure placidity of her countenance; and so, does look at her and admire her for fully sixty minutes while the express rushes onward through the wet, dark night, until at Clapham Junction there is a pause and comparative quietness, and Lady Petherick's white eyelids languidly unclose.

"Well," she says, placidly, "you have been looking at me long enough—is your previous impression strengthened, or the reverse?"

"Strengthened," Dumaresq answers, meeting her on her own ground.

"And that is?" she says, yawning carelessly.

"That you are the most beautiful woman I ever saw in my life," he answers, coolly, without a particle of enthusiasm.

"Merci!" she retorts, with a slight scornful smile.

"With a mental reservation, of course, in favor of the lady you love?"

It is a species of challenge he sees in the watchful glitter under Lady Petherick's dusky lashes, and Dick Dumaresq accepts it as such.

"No, I could not do that," he says, very slowly and quietly, looking intently at her. "Your sister is by no means so beautiful as you are."

CHAPTER XXX.

She cannot any longer preserve the pose of utter unconsciousness and so forsakes it at once for the extreme of displeased amazement.

"My sister?" she echoes, with a haughty frown, as of disbelief in the evidence of her own senses.

"Your sister, Miss Trefusis," Dumaresq answers, bravely and steadily; and now at that he has in this manner crossed the Rubicon, he feels he can go on undaunted, though he had to plead for his love with Sir Philip Trefusis and Lady Althea de Burgh. "You know, Lady Petherick, that I love her?"

"I heard it as a gossiping story, and laughed at it as such," she says, deliberately. "I never expected to hear you repeat it in cold blood. I am very sorry for it."

"Why are you sorry?" he asks, without flinching.

"Because I thought better of you," she replies, with calm severity, and with an air of matronly wisdom and justice that would have done credit to the mother of Gracchi. "I am very sorry to think you had not more common sense, or more self-denial, than to suffer yourself to cherish such folly, not to speak of the harm you might have done if my sister's feelings had become affected by it—an innocent, romantic child like her; it might spoil all the rest of her girlhood!"

"If—she loved me?" Dumaresq [illegible] and Lady Petherick [illegible] an accent of sarcasm in his eye. "Why, so, Lady Petherick? Because I have no present means to keep my wife as a gentlewoman? I shall, some day; and Imogene is too young to marry for two or three years yet—young enough to think of marrying in ten years' time."

Evelyn makes no reply, and sits so utterly silent, even when the train is at a standstill on Battersea bridge, that Richard for a moment has a fleeting hope that his audacity has made a favorable impression on her, or has affected her resolutions in some way.

"Is that what you have told my sister?" she asks, at length, in a cold, soft voice; "all that foolish folly about your attaining to a position suited to her, and waiting 'ten years' for you? I hope you have not been mad enough to trouble Imogene's mind with anything like this?"

"I don't think I have troubled Imogene's heart or spirit," he says, coolly still; "but she certainly knows that I love her as I love my own soul, and I am neither afraid nor ashamed that she does know it."

"Then, I repeat, I am very sorry, and very much disappointed in you," Lady Petherick retorts, chillingly; "yet, I suppose, in the event of my sister returning to town with me, I could trust to your honor to abstain from any further attempt to teach her to look on you as a lover?"

"I assure you, you may trust me to obey your wishes in anything as far as they do not interfere with or injure Imogene's happiness in any way."

"You constitute yourself the guardian of her happiness then?" Lady Petherick says, with a sneer. "Here we are in Victoria; please to call a cab for me."

But at the cab door she pauses.

"Richard, you must know it is impossible!" she says, pityingly. "You must know it can never be! It is not you—you yourself might woo the wearer of a coronet and not be refused, though Imogene Trefusis must refuse you!"

There is power, persuasion and tenderness in her soft, sweet voice, and Dick begins to feel a source of hopelessness stealing over him, a sense of his own "madness, folly, selfishness"—she has so stigmatized the love of his heart—being forcibly impressed upon him.

"Must she!" he says, sorrowfully, smiling, thinking of his darling in her white gown and her gypsy hat under the green hazel boughs, with the light of his passionate love reflected in her pure, glad eyes, and her innocent face crimsoned by his kisses. "Then, when Imogene Trefusis refuses me, I shall go my way and trouble her no more."

There is a flash of relief and eagerness in Evelyn's eyes which might have warned him.

"And nothing short of a verbal refusal will satisfy you?" she laughs, a little, cold laugh of scorn. "You must be either the most devoted, or the [illegible] [illegible] of lovers! [illegible] [illegible] the little tale [illegible] [illegible] remaining over you as a [illegible] [illegible] her!"

The taunt is barbed, and in spite of his courage and common sense it rankles sorely.

"And she never gave me any encouragement in what you term my folly and madness, beyond her sweet sisterly gentleness and cordiality," he says, humbly, "so she need but withdraw that from me whenever we meet for me to know that I was less now than ever her brother's tutor was to her in the days at Portdreath."

"I should consider it a sufficient [illegible] [illegible] a lover I was tired of," laughs Evelyn. "Well, adieu! I shall see you on my return from Cornwall in about a fortnight. Surely you will come?"

"I think it better not; many thanks for your kindness," he says, formally; "but I am really working so many hours, especially in the evening, that I have scarcely an hour to call my own, and besides, we are quite in different spheres, Lady Petherick, as you are kind enough to seem to forget so often."

"And you are rather uncomfortable at the thought of your own enthusiastic gratitude to me in that little room where the sunflowers are," Evelyn laughs, wickedly. "Never mind! I have forgotten and forgiven, quite, though they say a woman forgives but never forgets."

And the little hand that presses his in adieu manages to convey with the pressure a sweet, sorrowful meaning in her last sentence, and Dick again, half ashamed of himself and half fascinated, lifts the little gloved hand to his lips in farewell.

The Real "War Bread" must contain the entire wheat grain—not the white flour center — but every particle of gluten and mineral salts—also the outer bran coat that is so useful in keeping the bowels healthy and active. Shredded Wheat Biscuit is the real "war bread" because it is 100 per cent. whole wheat prepared in a digestible form. Contains no yeast, baking powder, seasoning, or chemicals of any kind. Food conservation begins with Shredded Wheat Biscuit for breakfast and ends with Shredded Wheat Biscuit for supper. Delicious with sliced bananas, berries, or other fruits.

LUCK IN AN AIRPLANE.

Curious Bit of Good Fortune That Saved an Army Aviator.

Many an army aviator owes his life to miraculous good fortune, like the British airman whose escape is described in "Tales of the Flying Services," by C. G. Grey.

An officer went out on a bombing expedition and met a German machine. In order to save weight he had left his small arms behind him, but he thought it was a pity to pass by a good target, and so he decided to drop a bomb on him. But dropping a bomb on a swiftly moving mark is not the same as firing at a fixed point. So he missed the German. Unfortunately for him, he also exposed himself to the fire of the enemy, and received a rifle bullet in the thigh.

To be strictly accurate, the bullet struck his trousers pocket, hit a five-franc piece, broke itself and the coin and distributed the assorted pieces of metal about the lower part of his body.

Feeling that he was badly hit, the pilot shut off his engine and dived for the ground from a height of about 6,000 feet. When he was a thousand feet from the ground he espied some aeroplanes in a field, and, not knowing whether he was over German or French territory, he made up his mind to land among the aeroplanes, certain that if they did happen to be German machines he would be well treated by the flying corps.

Two hundred feet above ground he completely lost consciousness, but in some curious sub-conscious way he made a perfect landing right alongside of a British motor ambulance. So well did he land that for some minutes no one troubled about him. When they did go to look they found a badly wounded officer in a state of collapse.

He was promptly put into the ambulance and sent off to the hospital. There it was found that the bullet had cut a large artery, and that the pilot would have bled to death in a few minutes if the bullet had not also cut a muscle, which had sprung back and wrapped itself like a piece of elastic round the artery and formed, as it were, an automatic tourniquet.

PERILS OF PEARL DIVERS.

Dangers That Beset Native Workers in the Persian Gulf.

The lot of the native pearlers of the Persian Gulf is a hard one, for all run the risk of getting scurvy from the lack of fresh food. Ice, of course, is unknown in the fleet, and the impure water breeds worms. The boiling and filtering of water do not appeal to oriental people as yet. The saibs, or rope pullers, get palms as hard and cracked as an ancient Bedouin's heel. They could prevent this by wearing gloves, but that would be a sign of effeminacy and bring ridicule upon them.

The exposure in the water gives many of the divers weak hearts and tuberculosis, and many of them become deaf because the weight of the water breaks their ear drums. Sharks abound in the gulf, and many divers have had a hand bitten off. One young Arab was brought to the American dispensary at Kuweit with his whole side laid open by a shark that had got a wide mouth hold upon him. The boy survived. We asked him if he would give up diving now.

"No," he said; "I will go back next year, I have to."

The danger of drowning is great, for sometimes a strong current carries the diver far away from his boat, and before the rope puller can bring him back he is drowned. The Arabs have no pulmotors, and they are not efficient in giving "first aid." If a man remains too long under water it was "written on his forehead," and that is all there is to it.—E. E. Calverley in Scientific American.

SOLDIERS ON THE MARCH.

Distances That Trained, Hardened Men Can Cover in a Day.

The Army Drill Book tells that trained and hardened infantry can cover from twenty to twenty-five miles a day when in small bodies. As the size of the command increases the distance covered becomes less, as the rate is lowered and time is needed to get all the units into and out of camp.

With a regiment or less of average troops—regulars—marching over average roads, the rate should be from two and three-quarters to three miles an hour, while a division cannot be expected to accomplish more than [illegible] and a half miles a day.

Of course all these figures will vary with different conditions of roads and weather. Untrained troops could not approach them until hardened. Though they might do better for a day or two, they could not keep up the steady pace of the seasoned regulars for a long distance.

Marching with full equipment is hard physical work, and, like every other form of labor, requires a proper period of training. The seasoned force will keep up a steady pace, with ten minute halts every hour, a fifteen minute stop being made at the end of the first half or three-quarters of an hour. Green troops are apt to straggle badly.—Outing Magazine.

FARM & GARDEN

COLD FRAMES.

A cold frame properly managed will pay for itself almost every season. Many of the plants used in the garden in summer may be kept over winter in a cold frame. A permanent pit is a good thing to have where there is room for it. The bottom and walls can be of concrete, brick or stone for the frame to rest on. The depth should be in accordance with the demands of the plants that are to be kept in it, taller plants requiring greater depth than those for which cold frames are generally used. Two feet is the usual depth of the excavation, of a width to suit the ordinary six foot sash, which is three feet wide, and the length is made to be covered by one, two or three or as many more sash as may be required. The sides of the pit are built up on the front or south side to a height of eight or ten inches above the level of the ground, and the back or north side is made about six inches higher to give proper slope to carry off the water from the sashes and to obtain the more direct rays of the sun. The frame when completed will be about three feet deep from the sash in front and six inches deeper at the back. Boards can be used in place of masonry and will be found serviceable for several years. The advantage of a wooden structure is that it is portable and can be shifted when desired to different locations in the garden.

The place where the pit is located should be well sheltered and it must be well drained; standing water in the pit will be fatal.

Air and light should be admitted when the weather will permit, and in cold weather the pits must be well covered with mats at night.

In cases of heavy snow the frames may remain covered for two weeks at a time without injury.

Cold frames are useful for preserving cauliflower, cabbage and lettuce plants during winter and for forwarding lettuce in the early spring. Radishes can be grown early in cold frames, also other vegetables, and finally the frames can be used for starting cucumbers after their season of usefulness has passed for other things. Thus a cold frame can be profitably employed fully eight months in the year.

Lettuce, cabbage and cauliflower can be sown in the open ground and when large enough, about a month after the seed is sown, they are transplanted into the cold frame and covered with the sash as the cold weather advances. Each sash 3 by 6 feet will cover about [illegible] plants of cabbage or cauliflower and about [illegible] lettuce plants. All these are nearly hardy and will stand some freezing without injury, but to stand this treatment they must be properly hardened. In clear weather, even when the thermometer in the shade goes down as low as 15 or 18 degrees, the plants must be well aired, and daily airing must be given as often as the weather permits, and when properly handled no protection other than the sash is necessary.

Young plants of lettuce, cabbage and cauliflower treated in this manner if frozen in the frames previous to a snowstorm will not be injured if allowed to remain covered for a period as long as two weeks if the snow on the sash is heavy enough to protect them from further freezing. If, however, the plants are not frozen when the covering of snow falls it will be necessary in three or four days to remove the snow or the plant will turn white, become weak and the whole crop may be lost.

Plants raised in this manner can be set out in the open ground in the spring [illegible] weeks before plants raised in the house or greenhouse.

Cucumbers require warmth and must be kept covered, but during warm days must be well aired. The sun's rays at this season are very hot and unless carefully managed the plants will be injured by the sudden raising of the temperature to a high degree.

Cold frames can be used in the spring for raising lettuce, cabbage and cauliflower from seed, and carefully managed, covering the frames as soon as the sun goes down and covering the sash with mats, the plants will be almost as early as those raised in hotbeds with far less trouble and expense.

By making the pit of the cold frame eight inches deeper the frame can then be used at will for a hotbed.

Where more than one sash is used on a frame strips of wood must be placed across the frame wide enough for the edges of the two sashes so they can be pushed backward and forward freely when it is necessary to air, weed or water the plants. The strips must be set into the frames so there will be no air space anywhere under the sashes when they are in position.

The idea of having the pit deeper for hotbeds is to accommodate stable manure where it is necessary to depend on this for heat. Where steam or hot water can be used a much shallower pit will be required.

If manure is used this is filled in and packed down by tramping, making it as solid as possible. As manure is somewhat scarce, half of the heating material may consist of leaves and these should be gathered while they are to be had. The manure should be piled up with a layer of leaves between layers of manure, and in a day or two vapor will begin to arise, when the pile should be turned over into another position and left until the second cloud of vapor arises, which will be in a day or two. It is now ready for the pit, where it should be placed and tramped down until it is a solid, even mass, two and a half feet deep. The sashes are placed in position and kept closed until the heat rises, and the steam given out should be allowed to escape. Do not be in haste, waiting patiently about three days, when the heating material has conditioned so that a thermometer in the frame shows a temperature of not more than 90 degrees.

The soil may then be put in place and should be from six to eighteen inches deep. Now is the time to prepare the soil, two thirds soil and one-third well-rotted manure thoroughly mixed, piled up to become incorporated. Turn it over once a month until used.

NOTES.

Sheep graze the pasture very closely and can thrive on short grass. For this reason it is possible to raise sheep on rough pasture land and where grass is not very tall. But it is not necessary that sheep be grazed on this kind of land, as they do better where there is an abundance of grass suitable for liberal grazing. Every farm needs at least a few sheep.

The fixed charges for maintenance are the same whether a cow is yielding [illegible] or [illegible] pounds of milk. The profit in keeping cows over and above that required for maintenance comes from the feeds that are given to the best advantage.

To make butter that will keep well, churn only till the butter globules are about the size of grains of wheat. Then, without collecting or gathering the butter, drain off the buttermilk and then wash in cold water until the water drains off clear. The smaller the portions of butter when the washing is done, the better can the wash water get among them for cleaning. When butter is collected in one large mass before washing, the water can only reach the outside of the mass, hence much buttermilk will remain in the butter to cause it to become rancid sooner than when it is washed clean.

Wife—Don't you think a great, big, tall, married man ought to be taken into the army just the same as anybody else? Hub—My dear, he only looks tall; as a matter of fact, he is probably short.—Judge.

The people who seem to get a lot of satisfaction out of being on the losing side are those who can say: "I told you so."

"You sometimes have to fight the devil with fire," remarked the Wise Guy. "Yes, but you will generally discover he has the most ammunition," replied the Simple Mug.

Municipal politics next!

Quebec, as usual, did her share to help the Kaiser.

Canada began on Monday to win the war. The referendum demanded immediate action.

If reports are true there promises to be several changes in the personnel of the Bruce and Saugeen councils.

Sir Wilfrid chose Quebec Liberals against the English-speaking Liberals, and he lost.

Quebec's attitude was clearly shown when it defeated Messrs. Blondin and Sevigny, the only two Quebec representatives in the cabinet of the Union Government.

A Port Elgin man, who has been through many hard political contests, says the present campaign has convinced him some women make good electioneers. This may be true, but we wonder if the ladies, after serious thought, will take it as a compliment.

* * *

The London Advertiser informed its readers on Friday that Laurier would have 135 seats, Unionists 60 and independents 38. Contrasting the prophecy with the actual results one would think that accuracy is hardly The Advertiser's chief asset.

* * *

The home towns of Messrs. McAulay and Bowman, the Laurier advocates, gave majorities for Union Government, Southampton coming along with 200.

* * *

If you've been over-anxious and have said some rather hard things, or thought some, begin now to recall them. Political candidates, after all, are not worth losing friends for, and the strange thing is that men, and women, too, are so eager to sacrifice home friends and old neighbors for some man they don't see or hear more than once in five or six years.

Union Government Prevails

In the defeat of John McAulay, the Laurier candidate, in North Bruce, many old line Liberals voted the Union ticket and accounted for the big majority piled up for the Unionist candidate, Mr. Clark.

The idea of the Union political parties gripped the electorate of this agricultural riding, and it lined up with the other ridings in the English speaking provinces in the hope that the Union idea will give to Canada a better war government.

Port Elgin, for the first time, changed from a straight Liberal majority of as high as 140 in past fights to a majority of 44 for the Unionist. In 1911 this town gave 87 majority for Tolmie.

The votes of the women counted fairly well for union, and from this fact it may safely be taken that the soldiers vote will be largely for union. When the soldiers' vote is added Mr. Clark's majority will be still larger.

In Quebec Laurier carried 62 of the 65 seats, which proved conclusively the Union argument that the issue was one of whether Canada would follow Quebec and slink out of the war, or follow the Union and support the Mother Land in her titantic struggle against the Hun.

And the religious influences of Quebec were felt outside of Quebec also. In constituencies where there were French-Canadian settlements, there the Laurier candidates were successful.

The Union idea is splendidly sustained and the working majority of 50 should be sufficient to ensure satisfaction to the English-speaking part of Canada, in the proper carrying on of the business of our country.

Quebec's part in the war, past and future, looms large in the minds of all Canadians, and although it will require time and thought, they will look to the Union government to make good in its demands that no province of the Dominion shall shirk its duty in this time of Canada's crisis.

That Christmas Dinner

Won't be right unless Eaton, the butcher, has supplied the meats and fowl.

Snow Shovelling

The great quantities of snow brings to the attention of citizens, who have regard for the appearance of our main street, and for the proper shovelling of snow, that something should be done by the council.

Most business places take pride in keeping their walks well cleaned, but there are many spots where there is always a struggle to pass any person, and besides it is very unfair that some of the places on the street should be well-shovelled while others are not cared for in any way.

Should we not have a uniform shovelling of snow from the library to, say, the armories, or, at least to Johnson Avenue There are business places all this distance, and The Times believes that Port Elgin as a town, is sufficiently important to have some uniformity in keeping off the snow, at least for the business section.

The Soldiers Friend club received the election returns at the town hall Monday night. Mr. Bald and Mr. Potter had charge of the announcements. The hall was well filled.

Card of Thanks

DOMINION ELECTIONS

Union Government Has Majority of 51.

ONTARIO SOLID FOR UNION

Quebec Is Only Province Supporting Laurier.

Loyal People of Canada Speak in No Uncertain Voice Regarding Conscription, and Only One Section of the Country Opposed the Sending of Support to the Boys.

The Canadian people endorsed Union Government by a majority that leaves no room for questioning their will to carry on the war to victory. The solid opposition of Quebec—only three Unionists were elected in the whole province, and these in English-speaking constituencies—the vote of the French elements in several Ontario ridings, backed up by the votes of all those whom the call of patriotism has left cold, were snowed under by the union of Conservatives and Liberals all over the country. Sir Robert Borden will go back to Ottawa with a majority of at least 51 members, which will be increased when the four deferred elections are held.

Ontario did its share by returning Union supporters in all but ten ridings, and in at least two of these the men elected as Laurierites—McCoig, of Kent, and Duncan Ross, of West Middlesex, voted against their leader on conscription. But if Ontario did well, the West rallied to the standard of Unionism in a manner that was remarkable. West of the Great Lakes Sir Wilfrid Laurier won only two seats—Provencher in Manitoba and one in British Columbia. Saskatchewan returned 16 Unionists, Alberta 12, and British Columbia 10 or 11. The sweep was accompanied by tremendous majorities for the Unionist candidates. In the Western cities Laurier candidates fell thousands of votes short, Centre Winnipeg supported Union to the tune of a 13,000 majority, a record that, in view of the size of the constituencies compares well with North Toronto's 14,00 majority to Sir George Foster.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN

Only in the Maritime Provinces did Laurier candidates make anything like a showing. In Prince Edward Island they carried three seats and in Nova Scotia won eight, compared with six won by Unionists. The Nova Scotia final return will probably be an even break, since the two Halifax seats for which the election has been deferred are conceded to the Unionists. In New Brunswick the Unionists have a margin of two to three seats.

Quebec did all that Sir Wilfrid Laurier expected of it. In fact, the Unionists won a seat less than they expected, but the two English-speaking Ministers, Hon. J. C. Doherty and Hon. C. C. Ballantyne, got through, as did Sir Herbert Ames. Outside of Montreal, however, not a Unionist was elected, both Hon. Mr. Blondin and Hon. Albert Sevigny being defeated.

It was a significant fact that with one or two exceptions, the ridings that Laurier carried in Ontario had either a strong German or French element. After the organized insult to Sir Robert Borden at Kitchener it was evident where the pro-German element in North Waterloo stood and the big majority rolled up for Euler, the Laurier candidate, was no surprise. In South Perth also voters of German descent made their presence felt, and South Bruce, which was won by Ruben Truax, Laurier candidate, has two or three townships in which voters of German descent predominate. The loss of the Essex seats to Laurier candidates was a surprise. The seats won by the Laurier candidates in the Eastern townships were carried by the solidarity of the French-Canadian vote.

With one exception the endorsed candidates defeated independent Unionists, the exception being Brant, where Col. Harry Cockshutt, the soldier candidate, defeated John Harold, the Liberal-Unionist. An interesting win for Unionism was that of Evan Fraser over W. M. German in Welland. Mr. German supported conscription, but he was nevertheless a strong Laurier partisan. He was regarded as unbeatable, but he fell over 500 votes short.

The four deferred elections—two in Halifax, one in Nelson, Manitoba, and the other in the Yukon—will increase the majority by four, all being regarded as safe Government constituencies. The returns from British Columbia were indefinite, but it appeared that only one Laurierite had been elected.

In a number of constituencies the vote will be affected by the soldiers' ballots. This is the case chiefly in Ontario constituencies, where the successful supporters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier had small majorities in almost every case. The khaki vote will probably swing several of these to the Government side of the House.

One of the surprises of the election was the defeat of Sir Wilfrid in Ottawa, where Mr. A. E. Fripp won the seat from the Opposition leader by a safe majority. Of course Sir Wilfrid also has a seat in Quebec City, but he has usually carried several constituencies for his party in former contests. Hon. W. L. M. King was also among the slain, being defeated in North York by J. A. M. Armstrong by 557 votes.

VOTING AT THE FRONT.

One Poll Clerk Wounded While Guarding Ballot Boxes.

CANADIAN ARMY HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, Dec. 18.—No less than 87 per cent. of the total vote of the Canadian corps had been polled by 6 o'clock Friday night. Some units have already polled one hundred per cent. of their ballots, while the general experience to date is that the number of men refusing to exercise the franchise is almost negligible in specific units, although the aggregate may be appreciable.

The election officers have taken their boxes with them on the tramways behind the lines, and have voted men as they worked. In the same way they have gone through the front-line trenches, giving men in the firing line their opportunity to exercise the franchise. One poll clerk has been seriously wounded, a presiding officer has been sent down to the base as a casualty, while one gunner voting beside his gun was hit by shrapnel.

Polling booths have been damaged by shell fire and by bombs, but there has been no serious interruption to the election work, and, above all, no interference with the actual war operations.

Tribunal on the Carpet.

WINNIPEG, Dec. 18.—As a result of a series of alleged irregularities, action has been taken to remove the members of St. Boniface Tribunal No. 71. Acting on order of the Department of Justice, E. R. Chapman, registrar for Manitoba, has made a long affidavit to show how this tribunal has disregarded instructions.

The members of the tribunals are Magistrate C. Henri Royal, of St. Boniface and ex-Ald. Jos. A. Cusson.

Unidentified Bodies Will Be Buried.

HALIFAX, Dec. 18.—Dr. W. D. Finn, the medical examiner, has issued a notice that all unidentified bodies at Chebucto mortuary not identified by Sunday night at 10 o'clock will be buried.

Sanitary conditions at the morgue are in perfect order and no danger of contagion exists.

WONDERFUL STUFF!
LIFT OUT YOUR CORNS

Apply a few drops then lift corns or calluses off with fingers—no pain.

No humbug! Any corn, whether hard, soft or between the toes, will loosen right up and lift out, without a particle of pain or soreness.

This drug is called freezone and is a compound of ether discovered by a Cincinnati man.

Ask at any drug store for a small bottle of freezone, which will cost but a trifle, but is sufficient to rid one's feet of every corn or callus.

Put a few drops directly upon any tender, aching corn or callus. Instantly the soreness disappears and shortly the corn or callus will loosen and can be lifted off with the fingers.

This drug freezone doesn't eat out the corns or calluses but shrivels them without even irritating the surrounding skin.

Just think! No pain at all; no soreness or smarting when applying it or afterwards. If your druggist don't have freezone have him order it for you.

TENERIFFE.

Spanish Possession Has Interesting History.

The most striking feature of Teneriffe is, of course, its famous peak. It is one of the great landmarks in these seas, and the traveller who approaches the island from Madeira some 200 miles away to the north is not long out of Funchal before he catches sight of the great mountain rising slowly out of the water. And so it may continue to rise all day, if the weather is clear, ever gathering to itself more detail, until, as his boat casts anchor off the mole at Santa Cruz, the peak towers above him, more than 12,000 feet. It gives one the impression that all of the island must be mountain, and the impression is not far astray, for, with its supports and spurs, the Pico de Teyde, as the Spaniards call it, does, indeed, occupy nearly two-thirds of Teneriffe. Its summit, on a clear day, is one of the great vantage grounds of the world. All the islands of the archipelago are visible from it, and the horizon is 240 miles away.

The island, of course, belongs to Spain, and, like most other Spanish possessions, has a long and interesting history. The story of Teneriffe is concerned largely with tales of high adventure on the high seas; of great enterprises, carried out by great adventurers, and afterwards "regularized" by the intervention of princes. Thus, although its existence was known for many centuries before his time, the island was officially discovered early in the fourteenth century

Minard's Liniment Co., Limited.

Gentlemen,—My daughter, 13 years old, was thrown from a sleigh and injured her elbow so badly it remained stiff and very painful for three years. Four bottles of MINARD'S LINIMENT completely cured her and she has not been troubled for two years.

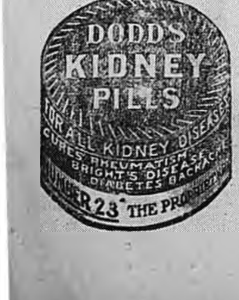
J. B. LIVESQUE.

St. Joseph, P. O., 18th Aug., 1900.

by Jean de Bethencourt, a Norman, who gave up his title to the King of Spain. The Spaniards, however, held their title loosely, and evidently thought little of their possession, for when next Teneriffe came into prominence it was in the possession of Henry the Navigator of Portugal, who made it and the adjoining islands a kind of base for his explorations in all directions [illegible] ever, the [illegible] In the year 1478 [illegible] Spaniards determined to re[illegible] their lost possessions, and by the end of the century they had succeeded in completely conquering the original inhabitants, and were masters of the whole archipelago. They have remained in possession of it ever since, and, to-day, the islands form one of the most enlightened provinces of Spain. This is especially true, perhaps of Teneriffe, which, only the other day, registered its views on the war in no uncertain way, when an immense mass meeting at Santa Cruz passed a resolution sympathizing with the Allies, and demanding that Spain should place herself on the side of the Entente powers.

Santa Cruz, indeed, has had some notable connections with the world's wars. It was bombarded by the British fleet in 1657, on the memorable occasion when Admiral Blake attacked the Plate fleet in the harbor of Santa Cruz, and demolished all the land defences in his "incredible attack." It was bombarded again by Nelson in 1797, and, although the town is defended by modern forts, the ancient batteries still remain. Santa Cruz is, indeed, in many ways, reminiscent of a hundred years ago. It has taken creditable advantage of "modern improvements" but [illegible] who visits Santa Cruz, with its low, flat-roofed houses and its plastered red-tiled churches, is surely reminded, if he has been to Southern California, of the relics of Spain in that country, dating as they do from much the same period. In California, however, Spain is a thing of the past. The Spanish missions speak of something that has been left high and dry and has no longer any vital connection with the present. In Santa Cruz de Teneriffe, however, Spain is all very much alive, and very much a matter of every day.—Christian Science Monitor.



Painting a Battleship.

One hundred tons of paint, costing approximately $25,000, represents the initial color requirements for a new battleship. The annual upkeep cost may exceed this sum, since it is the custom to repaint the different parts of a modern war vessel every three or six months. This would indicate an annual paint protection outlay of nearly $1,000,000 for the navy. If to this sum is added the cost of painting the thousands of lake boats, freighters, river steamers and pleasure craft some conception may be had of the importance of marine painting.

Among the most important naval paints are those which are applied to protect the submerged parts of the hulls from corrosion or fouling by barnacles. The word barnacle is the popular name for that form of marine crustacea which consists of a clam-like body lodged in a shell that is often formed in a series of rings or plates. They adhere with great tenacity. Without anti-fouling paints the speed of vessels would be greatly retarded by the piling up of a thick incrustation of barnacles and attached sea grass.—Boston Herald.

A GRAND MEDICINE FOR LITTLE ONES

Baby's Own Tablets are a grand medicine for little ones. They are a mild, but thorough laxative; are absolutely safe; easy to give and never fail to cure any of the minor ills of little ones. The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

SASH WINDOWS.

Probably a Dutch Invention of the Seventeenth Century.

The history of sash windows is somewhat obscure, but the probability is that they were a Dutch invention and that they were introduced into England soon after the revolution of 1688. The derivation of the word "sash" in this sence is the Dutch "sas," a sluice—old English "sasse." In Queen Anne's reign they were yet so comparatively uncommon as to be mentioned as a special feature of houses that were advertised as "to let." In the Tatler, for instance, May 27-30, 1710, there is this advertisement:

"To be let, in Devonshire [illegible]square, near Bishopsgate, a very [illegible] Brick House of 3 Rooms of a [illegible]oor, and a good Hall, with very [illegible] dark closets, the whole [illegible]ood light and well wainscotted and [illegible] house being Sash Lights." [illegible] sashed with 30

From England [illegible] they passed into France, where [illegible] up was Marshal [illegible] the first to put them: house at [illegible] de Lorge, at his new this, [illegible]ontmartre. CARE OF YOUR WATCH.

Caution Should Be Expected in Method and Time of Winding.

Do you know how to care for your watch properly? Of course you know that you can't expect it to keep time or even to run if you drop it on a cement sidewalk or tumble out of a canoe with your watch in your pocket.

But here are many finer details of care necessary if you are going to get the best results from your chronometer, says the Brooklyn Eagle. Uncle Sam, through his bureau of standards, has investigated the matter and has prepared a bulletin of instructions for the benefit of watch owners. He issues the ordinary warnings, advising you never to open the back of the watch, exposing the movement, unless it is absolutely necessary; not to let your watch become magnetized by proximity to electrical apparatus; to replace broken crystals at once, etc.

In regard to the importance of winding your watch regularly, the bulletin says:

"Even the delay of an hour in the time of winding may cause considerable variation in the rate in some instances. The winding should not be done jerkily, but steadily, and not too [illegible], and its [illegible] should be approached carefully to avoid injury to the spring or winding mechanism.

"It is generally regarded as slightly better to wind the watch in the morning than at night, as the [illegible] variations of the balance under the tight spring will perhaps give more uniform results with the movements and jar of the watch during the day than if the balance wheel were subjected to the lesser tension twelve hours after winding. The difference is, however, not so important as the regular winding of the watch; and if circumstances are such that one is more apt to forget to wind it in the morning than in the evening, the latter time of winding should be adopted.

"If one has an opportunity to compare his watch daily at a certain time with some source of standard time—as with the time sent out by telegraph or by wireless signals or by regular comparison with some accurate clock, as one daily passes a jeweler's store, for instance—it would be well to establish the habit of winding the watch at that time, as it is better to have such daily comparisons made at the time the watch is wound, and more regular winding will usually ensue.

"At night, or when the watch is not in use, it is desirable to leave the watch in the same position as during the day, and preferably in some place where it will not be subject to any great temperature change. If it is desirable to leave the watch in a horizontal position during the night for the sake of compensating any considerable gaining or losing of the watch in the pendant up position during the day, the same precaution to avoid marked temperature changes should be observed, and the regularity with which such a change of position is carried out may be as important as regularity of winding."

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE'S ADVICE TO A YOUNG MAN LEAVING FOR AMERICA

"You soon depart for the Western and I for the Eastern Hemisphere. A new career of action is opened before me, and I hope to unite my name with new and great events and with the unrivalled great men of the republic; you go to unite yourself once more with a people among whom whom I behold at once the simple manners of the first age of Rome and the luxury of her decline; where I see the taste, the sensibility and science of Athens, with her factions, and the valor of Sparta without her discipline.

"As a citizen of the world, I would address your country in the following language: Every man and every nation is ambitious, and ambition grows with power, as the blaze of a vertical sun is most fierce. Cherish, therefore, a national strength; strengthen your political institutions; remember that armies and navies are of the same use in the world as the police of London or Paris, and soldiers are not made like potters' vessels in a minute: cultivate union or your empire will be like a colossus of gold fallen on the earth, broken in pieces, and the prey of foreign and domestic Saracens. If you are wise your republic will be permanent; and, perhaps Washington will be hailed as the founder of a glorious and happy empire when the name of Bonaparte shall be obscured by succeeding revolutions." (Copyrighted).

Our advice to the Canadian people is to see that our political institutions are such, that the party in power will provide sufficient men for the necessary relief to our boys at the Front, and that they will aim to keep this great heritage intact, until our Boys come Home again. The Politician and not the Autocrat guides the destinies of our Nation. Therefore, it is our duty to see that the class of men whom we elect as Politicians, are the class of men who will hold sacred above all other things their duty to the flower of our manhood, who are now fighting the battles of democracy in the trenches of Flanders.

GOOD REASON TO BE PROUD

For the last two years the Canadian Pacific Railway, in connection with the Pacific steamers of the Canadian Pacific Ocean Services, has carried a very large proportion of the passengers from the United States to Russia, and as these passengers have included a great many American railroad men, who have been [illegible], surprised at the excellence of [illegible] the service, a remarkable volume [illegible] of trade is developing, greatly to the benefit of Canada itself. Among these passengers was the American Railway Advisory Commission, consisting of the leading railway experts of the United States, who travelled from Chicago to Vancouver, and thence to Yokohama, via the Empress of Asia. Mr. Henry Miller, vice-chairman of this highly important commission, has written Vice-President G. M. Bosworth a letter of deep appreciation, in which, after referring to many individual courtesies along the route, he remarks: "You have good reason to be proud of your organization and service, and we take this method of thanking you heartily for your kindness and courtesy."

VARIOUS TYPES OF AIRCRAFT IN BATTLE

As this is a war of scientific surprises and may later be won in the quiet laboratory of a professor of chemistry, it is only natural that the airplane should be constantly changed in design and equipment as either side developed improvements that might be copied.

Far from being the haphazard machine, darting about in spectacular fashion and with no particular system or tactics, the branch of air fighting has been highly developed into a separate branch of military science.

THREE CLASSES OF 'PLANES.

To begin with the 'planes used by the Allies at present may be divided into three classes: About 20 per cent. of the service 'planes are the very fast avions de chasse, or pursuit machines used exclusively for fighting; 30 per cent. are the slower types used for directing artillery fire, for aerial photography and scouting in connection with infantry and cavalry operations; 50 per cent. are the slower and larger machines used for bombing. All of these machines carry machine guns and some of them mount small cannon.

Of course, these proportions vary continually as developments require. At the present time, with the chances of air raids becoming more extensive, an increase in the number of bombing machines may be expected. To protect these bombing 'planes and the slow type of observation craft, a greater number of the pursuit machines will be required.

It is quite possible, however, that the observation, or scout machines, will be so developed that it will be able to mount guns of sufficient number and size to protect itself. This would prove economical, for it takes from four to six pursuit machines to protect the artillery spotters and photography 'planes. With sufficient artillery—three or four guns and gunners—the observation 'planes will be able to protect themselves and to attend to the special mission that is theirs—gathering information and taking photographs. As this would release four or six pursuit machines the attention of designers is being directed to the construction of larger machines.

The various types of aeroplanes and their armament follow:

Avions de Chasse.

1. The "Spad," one-passenger; speed, 200-210 kilometers per hour; a Vickers or Lewis machine gun synchronized to shoot through the propeller.

2. The "Nieuport," one-passenger; speed, 150 kilometers per hour; same armament.

3. The "Avro," one or two passenger; one or two guns.

Avions types "Corps d'arme" used for photography and spotting artillery fire:

1. The "Caudron," G-4, pilot and observer.

2. "Caudron," G-6, two-passenger, two machine guns, one forward, one in rear.

3. "Dorand," A-R, two-passenger; 1 Vickers gun forward; 2 Lewis guns in rear.

4. "Farman," two-passenger; two Lewis guns in rear.

5. "Caudron," R-4, three-passenger; two Lewis guns forward in turrets; two Lewis guns in rear.

6. "Letort," two Lewis guns in turrets forward; two in rear.

7. "Moineau," three-passenger; two Vickers guns forward in turrets; two Lewis guns in rear.

Daylight bombing planes:

1. Sopwith, one-passenger; 12 bombs; one Vickers gun.

2. Sopwith biplane; two-passenger; one Vickers gun forward; one Lewis gun in rear.

For night bombing raids:

1. Voisin-Plugeot; two-passenger; two Vickers guns forward shooting through propeller.

2. Brequet-Bichelin; two-passenger; same armament.

3. Farman; two-passenger; one Lewis gun forward.

GERMANY'S COMBAT MACHINES.

On the side of the Germans, the combat machines are the Ago, the Fokker, the Halberstadt, the Roland, the Albatross Bu.

The problem of the air comes down to a question of high speed in flying, a high factor of safety and a low-landing speed. The trend of modern design is toward the triplane because that type gives these factors with additional lifting powers.

The very great stresses caused by sudden changes in direction have been the reason for the collapse of many machines in action before the bullets of the enemy had reached the planes at all.

This sudden change of direction in the loops, the side slips, and the tail dives used by an aviator to gain the valuable position for which he manoeuvres puts speed at a premium, and in many cases the factor of safety was cut down almost to zero.

It is this new type of combat in air that has bred the new generation of Eagles. The tactics may be divided into three probable classes of combats.

First—Air duels of fighting machines where the object to be gained is to clear the sky of enemy airmen.

Second—Air duels between armed bombarding machines, photographing machines or spotting machines.

Third—Air duels between large armed airplanes.

Fourth—Fighting in formation.

CLEARING THE SKY.

The first class of combats are settled by these tactics:

The aviator, being told to clear the sky of enemy airmen, proceeds in a speedy machine to climb as high as he can and remain up until he sights an enemy plane. Then he dives at it, firing as he drops. If he should not bring the enemy down at this plunge, the attacker must land between his own lines and try again by climbing. It would be fatal for him to try to climb again before landing, as his adversary would then have the position against him, and would swoop like a hawk and destroy him.

Both Immelmann and Boelke, the famous German flyers started this method of attack, and brought down many allied machines before these tactics were analyzed. The method, of course, is good only over one's own lines, despite the fact that all air efforts are made to prevent hostile machines crossing one's line.

With a very speedy climbing machine and an expert flyer it would be possible to follow the rule laid down by Major Rees, of the British Royal Flying Corps, which was to dive as before, but unless an enemy was "out," to loop and start again to climb before the adverse plane has chance to take advantage of the position.

Against slow, heavy-armed observation planes the avion de chasse have a harder time, owing to the large armament of these other planes. The same dive is attempted, but it will this time be met with the fire of one or more guns.

DUELS BETWEEN HEAVY PLANES.

The duels between heavy planes become more a question of marksmanship and navigation. The battle goes to the better handled plane or to the one with the better gunners aboard.

Formation fighting is the latest development in air fighting. In this class of battle the planes are manoeuvred as a fleet might be, and these mobile chasers move as a rolling squadron from point to point.

In the battle, of course, there is a splitting up into individual duels and again ability to handle one's craft means life. If a cavalryman's horse is his best weapon, the airplane is without doubt the best weapon of the Eagle of to-day.

Just as a horse must be groomed and kept up, the machines are constantly overhauled in camp. Usually two mechanic experts in their lines are assigned to each plane, so that there is a personal loyalty established between the flyer and the mechanics in whose hands his life is placed.

In the day's work the mechanicians have the same pride in the performances of their pilot as the men of a stable would in the gallant running of a thoroughbred.

But personal gallantry, voyages into the sun and all the mediaeval romance of the air fights depends on material, and machines and gauges and all the thousand details of machine shops.

Thus it is that everywhere there is a lathe or a grinding machine there is a shop helping to turn out one thousand planes a month.

SCOURING SOAPS.

Some Handy Recipes for the Housewife.

A good scouring soap can be made at home at practically no cost at all, while it will be found far superior to many of the scouring soaps sold in the stores.

Save all the ends of soap left in kitchen, laundry and bathroom until a fair quantity is accumulated. Melt these in hot water to the consistency of a soft jelly and then add an equal quantity of fine, clean sand or powdered pumice stone. Pour off into anything convenient to harden. This soap may be used for the usual household scouring, but should not be applied to paint, because it may scratch or otherwise destroy it. This does not apply to painted floors. It is excellent for kitchen tables and floors, where spots of grease are apt to fall.

Bits of soap melted into a jelly and mixed with fuller's earth makes a mild scouring soap for removing stains from light colored garments and carpets.

GETTING the SPIRIT

ROSE ANN shook her head vigorously and surreptitiously drew her handkerchief from the folds of her peg-top skirt. Not surreptitiously enough, however, to escape the eagle eye of her co-partner in the notions at the Arcade Dry Goods Emporium.

"Why the dew drops, sweet [illegible]!" nagged Loretta of the twinkley hazel eyes and smooth auburn braids above her too perfectly arched brows.

"Oh, it's no use, 'Retta. Here [illegible] Wednesday, only one more [illegible] to shop, and I've got no more Christmas spirit than a burned out fire cracker. What's ailing me? I've done without lunch the last week, trying to get it. Not a tingle down my spine, not a thrill when I see an express wagon. I've shopped my usual nickel's worth when the crowds were thickest, and I've done everything but write a letter to Santa Claus. It might as well be Decoration Day for all the excitement I can gather."

"Forget it, Rose Ann," said Loretta, shifting her Spearmint from bicuspid to molar somewhere in the rear. "Oh," she added, seeing Rose Ann's hopeless expression, "go out and fell a pine or something. Get up a cantata, talk the weather man out of a snowflake. Hurry up, let's cover up these counters and beat it. There's the gong, and I've got a lead-pipe cinch on a table de hoty dinner with Mr. Fister to-night."

With leaden hands Rose Ann helped the nimble-fingered Loretta spread the drab gray covers over the notions. If one only worked in anything but notions at Christmastime. Nobody bought [illegible]; if they did, one could never [illegible] what they might be making. [illegible] ribbons or laces one might get [illegible]ots of new ideas and even suggest a few to the interested buyer. But supporters and hooks and eyes, and hairpins and tape! Nothing red but elastic; nothing Christmas but the dusty red bells, and artificial holly festooned above the tables.

In the tiny cloak room Loretta [illegible] her lace veil over a [illegible]tudie, and fastened her [illegible] jabot with a rhinestone [illegible]pin.

"Sorry I can't wait, Rose Ann. But I promised Mr. Fister I'd meet him at six sharp. Anyway, I think the new shoe department head would cherish a walk home with you. G'night."

With which parting shot Loretta waltzed out of the room on her way to a real dinner. Rose Ann pulled her sailor down over her brown curls with trembling hands. How did Loretta know the new head man in shoes had even looked at her! 'Twas true, he had spoken to her once or twice, and he sometimes came down on the same car with her, but as to his attentions warranting an open jibe from Loretta—never! With head held high she walked from the store with eyes to the front. She might have saved herself the trouble, for the new "poor but honest" as Loretta had dubbed him, was enroute home.

For blocks Rose Ann walked, darting between package-laden pedestrians, pressing her nose to shop windows, even venturing into some particularly gay places in quest of her earnestly sought Christmas spirit. Arrived home, she explained her lateness to her mother by pleading a headache, and the need of fresh air and a walk.

Long after her mother was asleep Rose Ann addressed her Christmas cards and cut tissue paper for her simple little gifts. Finally she threw down the scissors; her fingers wouldn't tie perky bows, her gifts all looked commonplace.

She dumped the lot into the box couch and dropped off to sleep with a troubled heart. Was she growing old at twenty-three? No, that couldn't be it—people at seventy-five still had Christmas spirit when they were supposed to. Was she ill? No, not when she could eat seven hot rolls for dinner.

The next morning found her no nearer a solution. But she was a normal girl, and she loved her mother dearly, and the sun was shining. So for the time she smiled and was happy. But once in the whirl of shoppers she was again disturbed at the lethargic manner in which she executed sharp orders; at her absolute lack of spirit.

She could not bring herself to look at the "poor-but-honest." She could not let him see that she was calm and spiritless at this time of all the year. Again she forfeited her lunch to dash out into the cold, stinging air; to mingle with the gay, hurried throngs. But she came back at one-thirty a little disheveled, with one or two last-minute gifts, and—no spirit.

The afternoon seemed eons long. When at seven o'clock the last shift came on for the Christmas eve rush, Rose Ann took off her black apron reluctantly. As she stooped to recover her pencil, Loretta remarked in no unkindly tone, "Even lookin' on the floor for your spirit, me little Rosie? Say, take a little more stock in things level with your eyes, and don't intensify so on the spirit, up or down! You'll find it sure as soon as you stop lookin' for it. Merry Christmas, Rose Ann, G'night."

Rose Ann hurried home to help her mother assemble some remembrances for the washwoman's children. The two of them made popcorn balls, and ginger-bread men with funny faces; filled stockings with candy and trinkets, and wrote rhymes for each child's Mother Goose book. Rose Ann's eyes glistened and her hair tumbled in riotous curls on her temples. At length they finished the baskets of childish, sweet gifts for the kiddies, and Rose Ann opened the box couch and brought forth her unwrapped gifts. Her heart dragged; her mouth drooped. For fear her mother would notice her change of humor, she snatched up a sweater and ran onto the back porch steps. For a while she sat with chin in hand, glancing first into one lighted window and then another across the alleyway.

Suddenly she jumped up, catching the post, strained her eyes across the darkness into a room in the opposite house. She brushed her hand across her forehead, and looked again. There in his second floor rear stood the "poor-but-honest," struggling with an awkward package on a table. He tried first one way and then another, then gave it up, clutching his hair, and tangling yards of red ribbon in his despair.

Rose Ann had a wild moment of indecision. Then dashing into the house she pretended a myster- though he traversed the aisle oftener than his duties demanded. ious errand to her mother, and rushed out sped down the walk and knocked at the front door corresponding to the back window above. For a brief moment her heart pounded and she thought she must run home. But e'er she could suit the action to the thought, the front door was thrown open, and there stood the "poor-but-honest."

"Er—well—oh," gasped Rose Ann, "I didn't know you lived here until I saw you from my back steps, and somehow, all of a sudden, I just had to come show you how to tie up that package. And I'm sorry—I—that I haven't looked at you, and—oh, let's go fix up the Christmas package."

And then the "poor-but-honest," because he wasn't poor in the real sense, and because he was very honest, did not mince matters. He let her tie up the package very carefully, because next morning it was to be for her. And he went home with her through the still cold night, and let her tell him how she had suddenly "gotten the spirit," by wanting to help somebody else. "That' the whole secret," she said happily. "I was too intent on doing things for myself. To-night I had a real thrill, when I was helping mother fix the poor kiddies' baskets. Then when I came to my own thought—over gifts, my heart sank again, and I had to go out and make myself get over it. Then I saw you struggling over that maze of ribbon, and the spirit came over me in a flood; and—"

They reached the steps. He took her face between his hands.

"Was it only the holiday spirit, Rose Ann, my dearest."

Her radiant eyes answered his question e'er her lips could frame a reply.

In the distance the Christmas carolers were singing that sweetest of Christmas songs: "It Came Upon the Midnight Clear."

Santa Claus' Mistake

IT was very early Christmas morning; it would have been quite dark in the bedroom if it had not been for the street light outside the [illegible]ndow.

Side by side against the wall [illegible]tood two white beds. In one slept [illegible]harlie Kennedy, aged five; in [illegible]he other, Donald Kennedy, aged [illegible]even, lay awake.

From the foot of each bed hung [illegible] stocking.

"It looks like night out of [illegible]oors," thought Donald. "But I [illegible]lieve it is really morning, and [illegible] it is morning I shall just have [illegible] peep into my stocking to see [illegible]t Santa Claus has brought [illegible]"

[illegible]nald slipped a bare pink foot [illegible]ously out of bed, then the [illegible] followed, and in his blue [illegible] white striped pyjamas he [illegible] to the well-filled stocking [illegible] emptied the contents on the [illegible]

[illegible] the dim light he could see a [illegible] knife, a Chinese puzzle, an [illegible] and a box of sweets, also [illegible]ockwork motor boat.

[illegible] put the things carefully [illegible], then looked longingly at his [illegible]rother's stocking.

"I'll just peep at Charlie's. That [illegible]ll be no harm," he thought.

Charlie had much the same as [illegible]nald, only in place of the clockwork motor boat, there was a cannon. Donald handled it lovingly.

"Santa Claus ought to have known that I mean to be a soldier. He should have given me this cannon," he muttered. "Charlie is to be a sailor, so the motor boat would be just the thing for him. Santa Clause has made a mistake—that's what he has done."

Donald put back Charlie's presents and crept into his warm bed. But he could not sleep; he kept thinking of the cannon and the motor boat.

"I am sure Santa Claus has made a muddle about us. I shall set things right."

And so saying, Donald got out of bed once more, and put Charlie's cannon in his own stocking, and gave his brother the motor boat.

Having done this, Donald once more got into bed, and this time he soon went to sleep.

II.

It was Christmas Day and breakfast-time. Around the breakfast table in the dining-room, decorated with evergreens, sat Mr. and Mrs. Kennedy, Donald and Charlie, and their sisters, Doris and Rose, whilst Uncle Bob was placed between Donald and Charlie to see that they "behaved themselves," as he laughingly remarked.

As they were all chattering, Ellen, the parlormaid, entered with a tray. On the tray was a letter.

"I wonder who it is from?" remarked Mrs. Kennedy. "I am sure the post has never arrived as early as this on Christmas Day."

"It is addressed to Master Donald and Master Charlie, and I found it in the drawing-room grate, ma'am. It looked just as if it had fallen down the chimney," said Ellen.

"What a peculiar place for a letter! Do let me see who it's from. Shall I read it out to you, boys?" asked his mother.

"Yes, please, mummy. I expect it is from Santa Claus. I dare say he dropped it down the chimney in passing," said Donald.

Mother and father smiled at this suggestion, whilst Uncle Bob grinned broadly.

"Why, it is from Santa Claus, as you said," remarked Mrs. Kennedy, looking very surprised. "He writes:

"Dear Donald and Charlie,—A line in great haste to say that I have just found I have made a mistake about the things I put in your stocking: last night. I did not know before which of you had settled to be the sailor and which the soldier, or I should have given the presents differently. Now I know, and, to make up, please look in the porch, and the box of soldiers you will find there is for the boy who had the motor boat, and the box of sailors for the boy to whom I gave the cannon. I hope this will please you both. I should have left the soldiers and sailors in your bedroom, but it is nearly light as I write this, and I am of a nervous disposition, and should not like you to see me, as I am so shy.

"Your loving friend.
"Santa Claus."

"How thoughtful of Santa Claus to write!" said Mrs. Kennedy. "I suppose Donald has the motor boat, so will get the box of soldiers; and Charlie has the cannon, so will have the sailors."

"No; I have got the motor boat," said Charlie. "And Donald has the cannon."

Donald did not say anything, but he looked very, very solemn.

"Oh, why did I change my motor boat for the cannon!" he thought.

He looked even more serious still when the parcels in the porch were opened, for the box of soldiers was the most splendid one he had ever seen. There were rows and rows of horse and foot soldiers, with shining swords and brightly-painted coats. The sailors were very nice, but nothing came up to soldiers in Donald's eyes.

"I think there has been some mistake," said Uncle Bob, noticing the piteous expression on his nephew's face. "I had a private talk with Santa Claus, and told him particularly that you were to be the gallant soldier of the Kennedy family, and Charlie the sailor boy. There has been a mistake somewhere, I am sure."

As the hours of Christmas Day went by the Kennedy children, with happy, contented faces, played with their new toys—all but Donald, and he looked more and more solemn.

III.

It was Christmas night, Donald and Charlie were in bed. Charlie was asleep, but Donald lay awake. Presently manly footsteps passed the half-open door.

Uncle, uncle—is that you?" called Donald.

"Yes; why aren't you asleep, young man?"

"I can't sleep; I am worried, uncle. Please sit on my bed, quite close to me. I want to confide in you."

Uncle Bob smiled in the dark.

"Speak on," he said.

"Uncle, you seem to know more about Santa Claus than the rest of us; you are friends with him, aren't you?"

"Yes; Santa Claus and I make little plans together sometimes. What is the matter?"

"Well, it is like this. I thought that Santa Claus had made a mistake when I saw the motor boat in my stocking and the cannon in Charlie's, so I thought I'd put the mistake right. If I had left them as they were, I should have had the soldiers; and I do want them."

"I thought something odd had happened," said Uncle Bob. "Another time you must leave Santa Claus to rectify his own mistakes. I am sorry about the soldiers, but you must be content with the sailors."

"I am awake," came from the other bed. "Donald can have the soldiers. I'd really rather have the sailors, but I did not like to say so," said Charlie.

So Donald had the soldiers and Charlie the sailors, and everyone was pleased.

And Donald has made up his mind not to interfere with Santa Claus' plans another Christmas.

FOR THE CHRISTMAS TREE

Make your Christmas tree ornaments.

Get ready plenty of glittering things.

String popcorn, cranberries and gilt paper balls.

Cut five-pointed stars of cardboard, and cover with gilt paper

Make tiny paper dolls and dress them like fairies to hang on the tree.

Use white popcorn freely on the tree; with pins attach a single piece of popcorn to the tip of each branch or twig. It takes a little time, but repays the effort, giving the tree a beautiful snow-rusted appearance.

Little peanut dolls dressed in gay colors make good tree ornaments.

Use yellow tarletan or netting to make small bags and fill the bags with popcorn.

Pink and white popcorn, wired in different shapes, is very nice for the Christmas tree.

A Realistic Picture.

A still life by Jan van Huysen in the museum at The Hague was injured, but it is believed that the perpetrator was neither thief nor vandal. The picture represents a basket of fruit on which a number of insects have gathered. On a pale yellow apple, which is the centrepiece in the cluster of fruit, is a large fly, painted so true to nature, the officials of the gallery say, that the canvas was injured by some one who endeavored to "shoo" it and brought his cane too close to the canvas. "A tribute to the painter's genius," says the letter recording the fact, "for which the work had to suffer."

Celebrating the Day Anciently and Now

On Christmas eve the bells were rung:
On Christmas eve the mass was sung.
That only night in all the year
Saw the stoled priest the chalice rear.
The damsel donned her kirtle sheen;
The hall was dressed with holly green.
Forth to the wood did merry men go
To gather in the mistletoe.
Then opened wide the baron's hall
To vassal, tenant, serf and all.
Power laid his rod of rule aside,
And Ceremony doffed his pride.
The heir, with roses in his shoes,
That night might village partner choose.

SO sang Sir Walter Scott of the glories of Christmas eve and of Christmas itself. And the world yields to him the palm for the best practical description of the season's dear delights.

Christmas with us is a day of giving and receiving, of good cheer and good feeling, and essentially it is one of religious significance. Hence it will sound strange to many to be told that a number of our Christmas customs come down to us from pagan times. Yet such is the fact. Traces of some heathen rites are found in England as well as here, and the cause of their survival lies deeper than theology. When the mother country, so called, was converted to Christianity the priests found her people wedded to many old customs. Not all of these were what they would have had them, but they had a practical work to perform and went at it in a practical way. The more revolting of these customs they properly uprooted altogether; the better of them they preserved, only in grafting the rites of the church upon them.

Thus it came about that festivities which had their origin in the old Roman Saturnalia and had come into use among the druids survived in the grim mythology of the Saxons and are a portion of our inheritance to-day. Conspicuous among these are the burning of the Yule log and the hanging of the mistletoe bough.

Among all people who celebrate the day at all it has always been a day for eating and drinking, for singing and dancing and merriment of all kinds. Indeed, this has been the criticism of the church against the manner of observance—that its spiritual meaning was too often forgotten in the general tide of worldly cheer.

In England its observance is universal. The chroniclers tells us that in Chesire no servants would work on this day, even though their failure to do so resulted in their discharge. The richest families were compelled either to do their own cooking on Christmas or eat what had been prepared beforehand, while dancing and merriment reigned.

And the games that were played number nearly legion, the most of them, though, on Christmas eve. Running in sacks, ducking for apples, jumping at cakes suspended by a string and trying to catch them between the teeth, drinking hard cider mixed with egg and spices, and a score of others—these claimed and still claim in Devonshire the time of old and young, the children themselves being allowed on this one night to sit up until the midnight bell tolls.

What has been aptly called "a beautiful phase in popular superstition," a very old belief, was that all the powers of evil lay dormant and harmless on Christmas Day.

The cock crowed through the live-long night to drive all evil spirits away; the bees sang in their winter hives; the cattle, half human at all times, became wholly so at midnight and talked like human beings.

Bread that was baked the night before Christmas could not possibly become moldy. The streets in many places were filled with mummers in fantastic garb.

Indeed, there were mummers in the days when Saturnalia reigned over even the Roman emperors, but they were not necessarily of the Christmas time. The love for masquerade is almost as old as the human race itself.

But as to the day itself, it was then, as it is now, a very merry day, with good fellowship bubbling even from hearts where theological nonbelief dwelt—a day sacred to the family, to the eating of roast turkey and cranberry sauce or roast beef and plum pudding and walnuts and the drinking of beer, ale and wine.

It has changed to some extent since the old day, but it is still the happiest day of all the year—at least where the shadow of misfortune does not cloud the sky.

GAMES TO MAKE CHRISTMAS MERRY

AFTER all, there are no new games more amusing or fun-giving than the old-fashioned ones, such as progressive conversation, pass the button, twisting a word to make as many other words as possible, guessing contests and forfeit games. Though there is "nothing new under the sun," one of these herewith suggested may [illegible] distracted holiday hostess.

Gathering Snowballs.

For the littlest tots this game will prove very enjoyable. To each one give a fluffy cotton snowball, which should be attached to one ankle with a narrow elastic, just to hold it lightly. One child sits on the floor while the others join hands and dance around him. Without moving from his seat, the one in the centre reaches for the snowball on the ankle that seems easiest to reach. The players must not let go of each other's hands in endeavoring to dance out of his reach. When one is caught he is deprived of his snowball, and must take the other's place in the ring. As the contest narrows down to the last two or three who still have their snowballs the game grows quite exciting. After everybody has served his turn in the centre, they may have a lively "snowball fight" with the trophies.

Novel Ways to Choose Partners.

To avoid the "twoseneness" which is so apt to exist in the average towns, the wise hostess plans to have her guests choose partners at least once during the evening. Two entertaining ways are given.

1. Cut a large circle of white cardboard, dividing it with red ink into as many sectors as there will be girls present. Write a girl's name in each division. Make a large red arrow and attach to the centre of the circle with a brad. Lay the circle on a smooth table and have each boy come up in turn and spin the arrow, thus choosing his partner. Of course, if a girl's name has been chosen, the boy must again take his turn. The hostess may avoid the embarrassment of there being a last choice, by refusing to be chosen until all her guests are accounted for.

2. Another very pretty method is to have a large holly wreath suspended in a doorway. Present the girls, who are in one room, with a piece of mistletoe to which is attached a long red ribbon. The ribbons are all put through the holly wreath and the boys in the next room each choose an end from the maze. The wreath is cut, and the girls wind up the ribbon, thus "drawing" their partners.

Charades.

Old-timey, but what is more fun than this game of guessing? The charades may be arranged for beforehand, or may be impromptu.

A littl girl with her arms outstretched, a star on her forehead, and draped with popcorn and tinsel would make an easily-guessed tree.

A boy might place a can on a table in the room, and in leaving, say "Ta-ta" (Cantata).

A boy wearing a Turkish fez, or an imitation one (cap with tassel) holding a key (Turkey).

One person might take aim with a small missile at another's foe. The answer is obvious—mistletoe.

A word which has to do largely with the modern Christmas might be suggested by one person calling the roll, and others in the picture answering "Present" (Presents). This is not as easy to guess as it sounds. Those who are guessing are looking for a catch-word.

Any number of words appropriate to this season may be enacted, and many may be thought up in the excitement of the game, which will cause much merriment and much competition between the opposing sides, which are chosen at the outset of the game.

Care should be taken to strain the juice through a fine cloth so no lemon pulp gets in, then this lotion will keep fresh for months. Every woman knows that lemon juice is used to bleach and remove such blemishes as freckles, sallowness and tan and is the ideal skin softener, whitener and beautifier.

Just try it! Get three ounces of orchard white at any drug store and two lemons from the grocer and make up a quarter pint of this sweetly fragrant lemon lotion and massage it daily into the face, neck, arms and hands. It is marvelous to smoothen rough, red hands.

County May Assist Halifax Sufferers

Warden Izzard took steps last week to have the county council make a contribution of $5 000 to Halifax sufferers. He presented the idea to the various reeves asking them to write him their consent. The replies were almost unanimous, but it was found by the Warden the procedure was hardly legal, and that votes of money must be made by the council in session. As it would mean considerable expense to call the council together and as the council is virtually out of office it was thought wise to wait until the new council assembles in January.

Christmas Entertainment

The Christmas entertainment in the Baptist church last Wednesday evening was a splendid success. Under the chairmanship of J. J. George, superintendent, a fine program was rendered by the school. The chairman reviewed briefly the work of the school for the year which showed good progress over last year, the attendance reaching over 80. A recitation by Nellie Wilson, a few remarks by the Pastor, then was introduced a tea party by the young ladies of Mrs. E. Roberts' class which for a half hour was very much enjoyed. Another recitation by Caroline Bannister followed by a cantata entitled "Santa's Advance Man" was well rendered. The leading characters were taken by Mr. Ewald, W. Saleman, Pearl Begg, Sarah Robinson, Florence George, S. Anderson, D. Wilson, E. Saleman, S. Osburne, Sarah Ciuley, Geo. Ciuley, Florence Bell.

Mr. E. E. Ewald made a splendid Santa Claus, and had a fine time in distributing presents to each scholar. Teachers also were remembered by the classes.

The Reeveship

Councillor Pattison still leads in the names mentioned for Port Elgin reeveship. Mr. A. F. George is being urged to get into the contest.

Councillor Cottrill, who is being urged by many friends to run for reeve, says he will be unable to please his friends. In the first place he is not ambitious for it, and his business demands all his time

Captain Roberts is said to The Times "Count me out I'm too busy".

For councillors there are N. Eidt, J. MacCallum, J. B. Cottrill, Ronald Bell, C. E. Schwartz, G. McLaren, J. J. George.

There is also considerable discussion on school board matters. Mr Stevens may resign from the high school board, and try for the public school board, while Messrs. Schwartz, A. Eaton and Dr. Wells are suggested for the board. There are two vacancies, George Black desiring retirement and W. C. McFaddon deceased.

OBITUARY

On Friday, December 21st at 2.30 p.m. the family and friends of the late John R. Ross of the 6th con. of Saugeen assembled to convey his remains to their last resting place. Deceased had not been in good health for some time and his family had felt concern, but his sudden death on Sunday night, Dec. 10th was a great shock and entirely unexpected. He visited Port Elgin Saturday and on Sunday entertained some friends In the evening the end came very suddenly.

Mrs. Ross and two daughters, Mrs. G. A. McLeod, of Halifax, and Mrs. R. A. McLeod, of Port Arthur, survive, and to them much sympathy is extended.

Mr. and Mrs. G. A. McLeod and Mrs. R. A. McLead reached here in time for the obsequies as did a nephew, David Grant, of Buffalo.

The late Mr Ross was born in Scotland but early found his way to Canada and in Lewiston, in 1860 he married Jean Ogilvie who survives him. They came to Port Elgin in 1885 and settled in their home on the 6th of Saugeen.

There were four children, two sons and two daughters. The boys John and David, died here some years ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Ross have been well and favorably known for many years and Mr. Ross took an active part in township matters.

GAVE HIS LIFE

LAWRENCE SCHELL

Lawrence Schell, son of Mrs. George Schell, Aberdeen, whose death was reported in The Times recently, died of spinal meningitis in the armyhospital in England

After having spent 18 months in France, Lawrence went to England on August 8th, having been transferred to the flying corps. It was a singular coincidence that just when Lawrence was returning from France to England, his brother, Captain Clifford, was going to France and the two met, and had a short time together. During the training for a lieutenancy in the flying corps, Lawrence took sick, and finally after a brave fight passed away, having given his life to the service of his country. He will be remembered as one of the noble young men of the country who heard the call to the defence of liberty and justice and who gave all he had—his life. For the bereaved mother and family sincerest sympathy is felt

Should Get Further Extensions

When Port Tribunal were handing out judgments in November their decisions giving several draftees certain time longer were made on the supposition that the first draft would be called December 10th.

It has happened that the first call is not till January 3rd. It would therefore be only fair that further extensions should be granted the men who have time certificates.

If the young men who have been given a few weeks to prepare for the call desire further extensions they should present their requests to Messrs. Izzard and Gillies, who, we feel sure, would be willing to take the matter up with the Registrar.

W. G. Dobson, of Toronto, spent Christmas with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Dobson, 10th of Bruce.

YOUR PERSONALITY.

Preserve It and Be Yoursefl and Not Somebody Else.

How hard do you fight to hold on to your personality?

You are willing to fight to save the money you have earned, to hold your job or to get a better one. You fight to keep your external possessions, but do you fight to keep yourself?

Without a personality, an individuality, it is impossible to achive any great success, no matter how successful you may appear for a time. The success that personality working through you in hot comes from having some strong man's personality working through you is not permanent or genuine.

When Napoleon was fighting Austria in 1796, on the very soil where the Italian battle line stretch to-day, he discovered that his own future depended on the overthrow of the royalist party back in Paris. He sent a young officer named Augereau to Paris to accomplish a revolution. Augereau succeeded in bringing about what Napoleon desired. But neither Napoleon nor history has ever given Augereau any credit. He deserved none. It was Napoleon, working through Augereau, who overthrew the royalists. Augereau lacked personality, individuality. That is why Napoleon chose him as a tool.

Trilby, singing under the spell of Svengali, entranced her hearers; but, with Svengali's influence gone, she was the same unsuccessful, lonely Trilby. Svengali chose her as a victim of his influence because her personality was not strong enough to resist him. He stole her personality, just as he might have stolen her little money or her old blue military coat.

Dr. Johnson was so strong a character that he unwillingly overwhelmed Boswell, and Boswell spent the remainder of his life tagging around after Johnston, worshiping him and writing down all he said.

But the Napoleons the Svengali's and the Dr. Johnsons are not the only influences in this world that rob us of ourselves.

For you the world is really divided into two parts. One part is the multitude tries to take away your individuality and make you part of itself. If it succeeds your life is bound to be a failure, for there can be no success for the young man or young woman who permits the multitude to absorb him.

Your personality is really all you have in this world.

If you think the mob's thoughts or let the mob think yours, if you live the mob's life and have the mob's feelings, you don't own anything. There isn't any you!

As you look yourself over are you permitting anything to crowd you out of yourself?—W. G. Shepherd in Washington Star.

"MALTA OF THE BALTIC."

So Fortress of Kronstadft is Known in Russia.

In a war geography bulletin the National Geographic Society of Washington gives the following information about the fortified city of Kronstadt, where rebel Russians attempted to set up a separate Government.

"The Malta of the Baltic" is the name given to Kronstadt and the small island of Kotlin, which it occupies, but a more appropriate name would be "the Gibraltar of Petrograd," for the supposedly impregnable fortress commands the sea avenue to the great Russian capital.

"The Island of Kotlin, which is a little more than seven miles long and a mile and a quarter wide, lies at the western extremity of the Bay of Neva, in the fresh water discharged by the River Neva. To the west is the Gulf of Finland.

"Kotlin was first fortified in 1703 by Peter the Great, when it was wrested from the Swedes, but it was not until seven years later the great monarch laid out the town of Kronstadt and began the systematic erection of its defences. Three hundred thousand men are said to have been employed on this work, but it was not completed until the reign of Peter's daughter, Elizabeth.

"The town, which had a population of 65,000 at the beginning of the world war, is intersected by two waterways—the canal of Peter the Great, begun in 1721, but not completed until thirty one years later, and the Catherine canal, constructed in 1782. Between these two canals stands the Italian palace of Prince Menschikoff, one of the most picturesque figures in all Russian history. Born of the most humble parents, Menschikoff at the age of 20 was selling meat pies in the streets of Moscow when he attracted the attention of Lefort, Peter the Great's favorite. On the death of the latter, Manschikoff succeeded to the place of honor with his sovereign and served him energetically. It is said of Manschikoff that he could drill a sergeant, build a frigate, administer a province and decapitate a rebel with equal facility. Upon the death of Peter he became the virtual leader of Russia during the brief reign of Peter's widow, Catherine I. A turn of the wheel of fortune finally cast him from his high estate, has great wealth, largely acquired through corruption, was confiscated, and he and his family were exiled to Sigeria, where he died in 1729.

"The modern fortifications of Kronstadt were designed in large measure by Gen. Todleben, the famous engineer, whose system of earthworks enabled Sebastopol to resist the siege of the French and English allies for 349 days during the Crimean war. Todleben devoted fifteen years to Kronstadt's defences, profiting by his wide experience at Sebastopol. The fortifications are in the main low, thickly armored earthworks with large calibre Krupp guns. There are three well-equipped harbors—the naval, middle and commercial.

"Guarding the approach to Petrograd, which is nineteen miles to the east, Kronstadt is also the chief station of Russia's Baltic fleet.

"While the city has good trade in iron, hemp, flax, tar and oil, it is handicapped to some extent commercially by the fact that the harbors are icebound from December to April. During these winter months the place is decidedly dreary in appearance.

"Peterhof, a town of 16,000 inhabitants founded by Peter the Great in 1711 and famous for its imperial palace, built in imitation of Versailles, lies to the southeast of Kronstadt, a distance of ten miles.

"During the summer season in peace times passenger steamers ply between Kronstadt and Petrograd with ferry boat frequency, the trip requiring an hour and a half."

GIFTS OF WAMPUM.

Relics of Senecas and Tuscaroras Now in Buffalo.

From Amsterdam, Holland, where dwell many descendants of the Holland Land Company, the Buffalo Historical Society has received two gifts of wampum which came into the possession of the company through its agents in America and are presented by Van Eeghen & Co. One gift is a string of wampum given by the Seneca Indians to Colonel Jeremiah Wadsworth at the completion of the Big Tree treaty. By him it was transferred to William Bayard, one of the Holland company's agents at that treaty, and so came into the company's archives. It is accompanied by the original document signed by Theophile Cazenove, October, 1797. Mr. Cazenove was the company's head agent in America and has a number of namesakes in western New York, including a creek, a park, a lake and other landmarks.

The other gift is a carefully made belt of wampum, presented to the Holland Land Company through Israel Chapin by the Tuscaroras, who had been left out of the treaty and begged the company for the grant of a mile square, giving the belt as a token of their great desire. Such relics are increasingly rare, and this wampum is a choice addition to the society's exhibit of western New York historical objects. As soon as a suitable case is procured both gifts will be placed on exhibition.

With the wampum belt are two letters explaining the position of the Tuscaroras. They are copies of the original letters written by Israel Chapin and Theophile Cazenove. Mr. Chapin's is particularly interesting because it states the argument of the Tuscaroras, who had always been a peaceable people, remaining loyal to the United States when other Indians were hostile.

"The Tuscaroras made a very sensible speech on this subject," says the letter, "when they found the tract allotted to them was not sufficient to afford them a living, that they had many children among them, which they were teaching to work in the manner that white people do. As they found they could not have recourse to any other method without a larger quantity of food, they must soon leave their poor children in a miserable condition."

Mr. Cazenove's reply that he must consult the company before promising the required tract is copied on the same sheet of paper. Both letters are dated 1799.

These gifts were secured for the society by Paul D. Evans, who has been making a special study of the Holland company and has been going through the documents at the Historical building. He found it necessary to go to Amsterdam and was asked by Mr. Severance to look up for the society any object which might be of interest to the museum, particularly on the subject of the Holland Land Company.—Buffalo Express.

Kept Good by the Sealed Package

A Dialogue on Peace Between a Householder and a Burglar

(Henry Van Dyke, in December Scribner's.)

The house was badly wrecked by the struggle which had raged through it. The walls were marred, the windows and mirrors shattered, the pictures ruined, the furniture smashed into kindling-wood.

Worst of all, the faithful servants and some of the children were lying in dark corners, dead or grievously wounded.

The Burglar, who had wrought the damage, sat in the middle of the dining-room floor, with his swag around him. It was neatly arranged in bags, for in spite of his madness he was a most methodical man. One bag was labelled silverware; another, jewels; another, cash, and another, souvenirs. There was blood on his hands and a fatuous smile on his face.

"Surely, I am a mighty man," he said to himself, "and I have proved it! But I am very tired, as well as kind-hearted, and I feel that it is now time to begin a conversation on Peace."

The Householder, who was also something of a Pacifist on appropriate occasions, but never a blind one, stood near. Through the brief lull in the rampage he overheard the mutterings of the Burglar.

"Were you speaking to me?" he asked.

"As a matter of fact," answered the Burglar, "I was talking to myself. But it is the same thing. Are we not brothers? Do we not both love Peace? Come sit beside me, and let us talk about it."

"What do you mean by Peace", said the Householder, looking grimly around him; "do you mean all this?"

"No, no," said the Burglar; "that is—er—not exactly! 'All this' is most regrettable. I weep over it. If I could have had my way unopposed it would never have happened. But until you sit down close beside me I really cannot tell you in particular what I mean by that blessed word Peace. In general, I mean something like the status quo ante bel——"

"In this case," interrupted the Householder, "you should say the status quo ante furtum—not bellum (the state of things before the burglary, not before the war). You are a mighty robber—not a common thief, but a most uncommon one. Do you mean to restore the plunder you have grabbed?"

"Yes, certainly," replied the Burglar, in a magnanimous tone: "that is to say, I mean you shall have a part of it, freely and willingly. I could keep it all, you know, but I am too noble to do that. You shall take the silverware and the souvenirs. I will take the jewels and the cash. Isn't that a fair division? Peace must always stand on a basis of equality between the two parties. Shake hands on it."

The Householder put his hand behind his back.

"You insult me," said he. "If I were your equal I should die of shame. Waive the comparison. What about the damage you have done here? Who shall repair it?"

"All the world," cried the Burglar eagerly; "everybody will help—especially your big neighbor across the lake. He is a fool with plenty of money. You cannot expect me to contribute. I am poor, but as honest as my profession will permit. This damage in your house is not wilful injury. It is merely one of the necessary accompaniments of my practice of burglary. You ought not to feel sore about it. Why do you call attention to it, instead of talking politely and earnestly about the blessings of Peace?"

"I am talking to you as politely as I can," said the Householder, moistening his dry lips, "but while I am doing it, I feel as if I were smeared with mud. Tell me, what have you to say about my children and my servants whom you have tortured and murdered?"

"Ah, that," answered the Burglar, shrugging his shoulders and spreading out his hands, palms upward, so that he looked like a gigantic toad, "—that indeed is so very, very sad! My heart mourns over it. But how could it be avoided? Those foolish people would not lie down, would not be still. Their conduct was directly contrary to my system: see section 417, chapter 3, in my 'Great Field-Book of Burglary,' under the title 'Schrecklichkeit.' Perhaps in the excitement of the moment I went a little beyond those scientific regulations. The babies need not have been killed—only terrified. But that was a mere error of judgment which you will readily forgive and forget for the sake of the holy cause of Peace. Will you not?"

The Householder turned quickly and spat into the fireplace.

"Blasphemer," he cried, "my gorge rises at you! Can there be any forgiveness until you repent? Can there be any Peace in the world if you go loose in it, ready to break and enter and kill when it pleases you? Will you lay down your weapons and come before the Judge?"

The Burglar rose slowly to his feet, twisting up his moustache with bloody brass-knuckled hands.

"You are a colossal ass," he growled. "You forget how strong I am, how much I can still hurt you. I have offered you a chance to get Peace. Don't you want it?"

"Not as a present from you," said the Householder, slowly. "It would poison me. I would rather die a decent man's death."

He went a step nearer to the Burglar, who quickly backed away.

"Come," the Householder continued, "let us bandy compliments no longer. You are where you have no right to be. You can talk when I get you before the Judge. I want Peace no more than I want Justice. While there is a God in heaven and honest freemen still live on earth I will fight for both."

He took a fresh grip on his club, and the Burglar backed again, ready to spring.

Through the dead silence of the room there came a loud knocking at the door. Could it be the big neighbor from across the lake?

What Happened When Schwab Saw Kitchener

One of the first acts of Lord Kitchener after being placed in charge of the British military campaign against Germany was to send a call for Charles M. Schwab. The Bethlehem steel master wired "coming" and literally rushed for a steamer. Of the meeting of these two world figures and of what transpired on that momentous occasion B. C. Forbes, in Forbes Magazine, gives the first authentic details which have reached the public ear. He refers to the fact that these two were not unknown to each other, that the S. O. S. from K. of K., therefore, came as no surprise to the steel king, and continues in his graphic style:

So quietly and quickly did Mr. Schwab betake himself on board the Olympic that not one reporter ferreted out the fact. Nor, during all the tragic events which marked the mammoth liner's voyage was the presence of America's greatest steel king disclosed—not even when Admiral Jellicoe, commander of the British Grand Fleet, came aboard off the north coast of Ireland to take Mr. Schwab off and escort him to his famous flag ship, the Iron Duke.

But we are outrunning our story. Six days after leaving New York the Olympic was near the Irish coast when Capt. Haddock received a momentous message. The Audacious—the pride of the British navy, the new super-dreadnought, which had been built at a cost of $10,000,000 and carried guns which could outshoot Germany's best by several miles and had won the blue ribbon of naval gunnery—had, the message disclosed, met with a terrible mishap and threatened to flounder with her crew of almost a thousand bluejackets. Captain Haddock steamed straight for the wounded Audacious, and, by brilliant seamanship, rescued the sinking dreadnought's entire crew.

Charles M. Schwab was on the deck of the Olympic as the raging seas swept over the battleship's poet deck. With characteristic presence of mind, Mr. Schwab ran for his camera and took a snapshot of the Audacious at the moment she was partly submerged, a picture which is destined to prove as historic as any taken during the entire war.

The Audacious had either struck a mine or had been torpedoed amidship. Her engines had been knocked out of commission, and all attempts to tow her to shallow water—she was about twenty-five miles from land—proved futile, as no hawser from either the Olympic or the Audacious could withstand the strain of the 45,000-ton liner tugging at the 20,000-ton battleship. The rescue successfully completed, the Olympic steamed into Lough Swilly, on the north coast of Ireland.

At nightfall the passengers on board the liner saw a tremendous flash out of the sea, heard an earthly roar—and knew the Audacious had blown up.

Lord Kitchener meanwhile was moving heaven and earth to have Schwab brought to London without a moment's delay. Strict orders had been given that no one be allowed to leave the Olympic, and, as a matter of fact, the liner lay isolated in Lough Swilly from Oct. 27 to Nov. 2. So anxious was Kitchener to see Schwab, however, that he had the Admiral of the British Grand Fleet himself go alongside the Olympic and take Mr. Schwab off. Sir John Kellicoe and Mr. Schwab needed no introductions, for when Jellicoe was only a captain the discerning eyes of the steel master had spotted him as a coming man and become very friendly with him. Jellicoe rushed Schwab part of the voyage, and then Admiral Fisher took charge of the completion of the journey. Schwab was the only person permitted to leave the liner—he was forbidden to take even his man-servant with him.

At 6 o'clock in the evening Mr. Schwab reached London. Without taking time to go to a hotel he sped direct to the War Office. Word had been passed to the confidential attendants that the great American steel masters and armor maker was coming, and, the moment he appeared, doors were opened for him as if by magic—doors that were being vainly besieged by hundreds of manufacturers and others, all anxious to get the ear of the mighty Kitchener or some other personage in authority.

Kitchener was ready for him.

He rose and greeted Mr. Schwab very cordially but very briefly.

Then he motioned to the only other chair in his office—apart from this chair, the one occupied by Kitchener and a large flat-topped desk, there was nothing in the whole vast room in the way of furniture except an army bed, the only bed which Kitchener's body knew night after night during those terrible days, for the war lord worked literally night and day and had no time to leave his office for sleep. It was just after the annihilation of a great part of Britain's little army at the Battle of the Mons and the subsequent retreat.

Kitchener wore none of the insignia, none of the decorations of a Field Marshal, none of the many orders or honors conferred upon him by a grateful Empire, not even a suggestion of gold braid. He wore a khaki suit so plain and undisguised that he could have been taken for a private in the ranks, a private who has been on active service and had not had frequent opportunity to furbish up his uniform—Kitchener evidently had slept in his clothes.

Kitchener's countenance and deportment suggested that of Atlas bent under the weight of the world. His eyes, usually so bright and sharp and penetrating, looked tired and heavy. His demeanor was tragically grave. He appeared to be physically bowed down by the responsibility pressing upon his shoulders.

Without loss of a moment Kitchener got down to business.

How many shells could Schwab supply—a million?

Yes, Schwab could turn out a million.

How long would it take—how quickly could they be shipped?

Ten months.

Good. How about guns?

Yes, Schwab could supply guns in quick order.

Good. What else could Schwab provide?

Schwab told him.

Good.

What about price? asked Mr. Schwab.

Quick delivery was more important than any quotation of price. Get the stuff under way and he would get his price, Schwab was told.

It was war time and was not his company entitled to a war profit, suggested Schwab.

Certainly.

It was to be a long, titanic struggle Kitchener confided. He counted upon it lasting five years. (A prophesy to be fulfilled?) He realized very fully that Schwab's was the only huge free ordnance plant in the world, and he was anxious to have Mr. Schwab's pledge that control of Bethlehem would not be sold as long as contracts were being filled for the British.

Would Mr. Schwab sign an agreement to that effect?

"Buz-z-z" went the telephone on Kitchener's desk.

A look of annoyance flashed across his countenance. Who had dared to interrupt him in the midst of so vital and so pressing a conference, when every moment's delay heightened the danger of disaster?

"Excuse me" said Kitchener, picking up the receiver with a jerk.

Schwab sat in silence.

"Yes-Yes," Kitchener began sharply. Then his voice softened. He listened attentively for a moment or two, asked several questions, gave instructions and then hung up the receiver.

"That," he said by way of apology to Mr. Schwab, "was a call from Belgium. The officer was under fire while he was talking with me. He was speaking direct from the battlefield."

The war lord made a gesture, dismissing that subject, and looked squarely at Mr. Schwab for an answer to the request that he put his signature to an agreement not to part with control of Bethlehem Steel.

REFUSES $100,000,000 FOR BETHLEHEM; SIGNS PLEDGE.

Control of Bethlehem had been valued by certain other interests — not British—as being worth to them $100,000,000. That sum was offered Schwab for his Bethlehem holdings. Here he was being asked to sign a solemn compact to refuse $100,000,000 or any other number of millions of dollars without any monetary compensation. Did Schwab hesitate to cast aside the $100,000,000? Not for a moment.

He assured Kitchener he would sign such an agreement—and sign it he did.

Under the Atlantic Ocean on the night of that epochal interview between the greatest military genius in the world and the greatest steel manufacturer the world has ever known came messages of the mightiest importance to Mr. Schwab's right-hand executives, messages that were to make industrial history in America. Within twenty-four hours the Bethlehem Steel Company's plants began to buzz and hum as never before. Gigantic preparations were at once begun for the production of the engines of war on a scale that neither the United States nor Germany had ever before known, preparations that were to expand and expand until Bethlehem's output was to dwarf that of Germany's munition-making idol, Krupp's.

The next day and the next and the next Kitchener and Schwab again were closeted in secret sessions, in sessions upon the outcome of which the fate of the Britain and her allies in no small measure depended. Kitchener took Schwab into his innermost confidence. He kept nothing back. Some of the facts he disclosed could not be confided even to Mr. Schwab's chief executive and to this day they have never been revealed to a soul nor committed to writing.

FLEET BLAMED FOR DISASTER

British Press is Caustic Over Convoy's Disaster.

Daily Telegraph Writer Backs Admiralty.

London Cable—The serious view entertained here on the successful German double attack on shipping in the North Sea is reflected by the great prominence and space given in the morning newspapers to this incident, but much of the editorial comment is restrained, the desire being expressed by several commentators to await the result of the official inquiry.

The Daily Chronicle says: The serious feature is the painful reflection cast upon the administrative efficiency of the Grand Fleet. Such a mistake would not be repeated after an eight weeks' interval unless some screws in the machinery were very dangerously loose. The circumstances call for a court of enquiry appointed by the Admiralty from the outside. It is not enough for the enquiry to be appointed by the commander-in-chief nor composed of his subordinates."

The Times says: "The attack required a good deal more of explanation than the raid in October concerning which the two points made by the First Lord were that the wireless was smashed and that the enemy came at night. Neither of these pleas appears relevant in the enemy's latest exploit, and while judgment must be suspended until after the enquiry, it is impossible not to feel that the thing should never have happened."

The Daily Express says: "The public demands to know why the covering force which would have protected the convoy was not on the scene. We assert that these incidents are avoidable."

Archibald S. Hurd, the well-known writer on naval subjects, in the Daily Telegraph, refuses to assume any failure on the part of anybody, from the commander-in-chief to the youngest seaman concerned, and points out the difficulties of the task and the great results achieved. He contends that the real explanation is that the navy has not enough ships for its multifarious duties and especially lacks enough small ships.

"Although we have been building ships," he continues, "the navy has never been provided with an adequate supply of small craft owing to the shortage of labor and steel.

"All that can be said is that our strength is greater to-day than it was, though all insufficient because of losses incurred at sea. In one recent month this year, in home waters alone, our naval forces steamed seven million miles in areas in which enemy submarines were active, and in which also enemy mines by the thousand lurked.

"The navy, and particularly the officers and men who serve in small craft, have been overlooked ever since the war began, because the naval forces have never been adequate to ensure rest for those who are bearing the main burden."

The writer, like some others, recalls Sir Eric Geddes' statement explaining the October raid, that, between April and October 4,500 merchantmen were escorted between Britain and Norway without a single ship being lost by a surface attack. He also says that since the beginning of the convoy system until December 1st, less than one-and one-half per cent. of convoyed cargoes bound inward has been lost.

ENEMY SCORES ONCE AGAIN ON THE NAVY

Merchant Convoy, Mine Sweepers and Destroyer Sunk.

PROTECTORS ABSENT

Force to Guard Against Surface Attacks Not in Touch.

London Cable says—One British and five neutral merchantmen, a British destroyer and four mine-sweepers have been sunk in the North Sea by German naval forces.

The losses were the result of an attack on a convoy bound from Scotland to Norway. The tonnage of the lost merchantmen was 8,950.

In announcing the sinking of the vessels, Sir Eric Geddes, First Lord of the Admiralty, said the merchant vessels were being convoyed by the destroyers Partridge and Pelew. The Partridge was sunk and the Pelew was damaged.

Sir Eric said that the circumstances of the attack, so far as available, were that the Partridge sighted four enemy destroyers shortly before noon, and, with the Pelew engaged them, while the convoy scattered. The Partridge was hit heavily. Shortly afterward an explosion occurred on board and she sank. The Pelew was pierced at the water line and her engines were disabled, but eventually she was brought safely to port. The enemy then attacked the convoy.

The entire crew of the trawler Lord Alverston was saved in one of its own boats. The casualties on the Pelew were one officer and three men killed and two wounded seriously. Information regarding the crew of the Partridge, Sir Eric said, was incomplete, but a report from Kiel told of the taking there of three officers and 21 men from the Partridge, and of one officer and 25 men from the trawlers.

Eighty-eight Scandinavians, two of whom are women, and ten British were rescued by four British destroyers detached from a cruiser squadron, which was hastened to the scene. Other survivors reached Norway in boats.

A similar attack on a convoy was made last October, when nine neutral merchantmen and two British destroyers in the escort were sunk by German raiders.

PROTECTING FORCE ABSENT.

The Partridge and the Pelew, together with four armed trawlers, said Sir Eric, comprised the anti-submarine escort of the convoy. For some reason as yet unexplained, he added, the force which was sent for the purpose of protecting the convoy against surface attacks was not on the scene in time to prevent the destruction of the convoy.

A court of enquiry had been appointed to investigate the circumstances, he announced. A second convoy which also was being covered, was not attacked.

Sailors who have reached Christiania from the ships sunk by German warships in the North Sea, say that fire was opened by the attacking cruisers at a range of 3,260 yards, and that within a half-hour the British armed ships, with the exception of the destroyed Pelew were sunk. Steamers from steamers in the convoy saved 198 sailors in all, who were landed on the west coast of Norway. Fifty-nine of the rescued were British.

RAIDERS REACHED THE TYNE.

Two neutral merchant vessels and a trawler were sunk off the Tyne on December 12 by German destroyers, Thomas J. McNamara, Financial Secretary to the Admiralty, announced in the House of Commons to-day.

By penetrating the waters off the mouth of the Tyne the Germans carried their operations close to the English coast for the first time recently, so far as the official communications have shown. The Tyne flows through Northern England into the North Sea at South Shields.

ADMIT SHARES IN BOMB PLOT

Three On Trial With Kaltschmidt Testified.

Met in Detroit Hotel to Formulate Plans.

Detroit, Mich., Despatch—Three of the five persons on trial here with Albert C. Kaltschmidt on charges of conspiring to destroy public and private property in the United States and Canada took the stand in their own behalf to-day. All admitted participation in the alleged plots but declared that at the time they did not know what was being done. Fritz Neef, Franz Respa, a native of Germany, 70 years old, and Carl Schmidt, were the defendants who testified to-day.

Neef testified that Kaltschmidt told him of dynamite plots, and he protested, saying, "No good would accrue to Germany by killing innocent persons."

He told Kaltschmidt, he testified, that he would have nothing to do with the plans. He testified also that a meeting was held at a local hotel, at which means of bringing an embargo on munition shipments to the allies were discussed. Kaltschmidt, he said, worked hard for this plan.

Respa, through an interpreter, said that dynamite was brought to his home by his daughter, Mrs. Carl Schmidt, also on trial, and Wm. Jarosch, who testified recently for the Government. He did not know, he testified, why the explosive was brought to his home.

Schmidt testified that Kaltschmidt asked him to do some work for him. He was asked, he said, to get information about railroad tracks, particularly whether there were single or double tracks at different places. He said he did not know Kaltschmidt's reasons for wanting the information.

Further evidence intended to show that money Kaltschmidt is charged with having received through German official sources, was a personal loan, was introduced at the forenoon session. John Ballantyne, president of a local bank, testified that Kaltschmidt in October, 1915, paid $22,000 to two Toronto men for their interest in his ~~[illegible]~~ factory at Marine City, Michigan.

ANOTHER RAID UPON LONDON

London Cable — German aeroplanes raided English coast towns to-night. Some of the raiders reached London, where they were met with a heavy fire. Numerous bombs were dropped.

An official announcement of the raid says:

"Hostile aeroplanes crossed the Essex and Kent coast about 6.15 o'clock and proceeded towards London. Some of the raiders reached the London district and dropped bombs. Bombs also were dropped in Kent and Essex.

"Reports of casualties and damage have not yet been received. Our guns and aeroplanes were both in action."

Muggins—How's your mother-in-law? Buggins—Well, she's improving, but slowly. Muggins—I'm glad to hear that.

GERMANS DRIVE MEN TO BATTLE

Foe's Army Deteriorating, Events Show.

Laggards Forced Up by Barrage Fire.

Liverpool Cable—Evidence that the German commanders are well aware that the German army is deteriorating and that they have to try to keep it together by terrifying their troops is given in a letter written by an officer of a Liverpool regiment to one of the local newspapers. Expressing the opinion that the "collapse of the Germans will come soon," he added:

"The best cure for pessimism would be a few days in the front line trenches. There are no pessimists here except among the German prisoners.

"The last time our battalion was in action we took quite a number of prisoners and they were a dismal lot. One non-commissioned officer with whom I spoke told me that large numbers of the Germans simply will not face our fire, but refuse to attack. His own company had been under fire for nearly five days and at last they had signed a round-robin to the company commander to say that they could not stay any longer. Two of the ringleaders were arrested with the idea of making an example of them, but their comrades demanded their release with such energy that the officers had to give way. Later on the men repeated their demand to be taken out of the front line. The officers ordered them back to duty, but the men refused. The officers threatened the soldiers, who replied by killing all but four of the officers and marching over to the British lines to surrender.

"When this particular battalion was moved up against the British, the men had to be bullied into fighting by being sent into action in front of a moving barrage, which meant certain death to all who lagged behind.

"On another occasion recently, our Liverpool regiment had a fierce fight which ended up with a strange experience. We had heavily engaged and driven off in panic some Germans who had been holding a strong position. Moving on to the next objective, another party of the enemy appeared. We felt certain that we were in for a rough experience, but the truth was that this bunch wanted to surrender badly, and they had made a pretense of advancing to a counter-attack with the object of getting near enough to us to be sure of protection from their own officers.

"When the German command found out what had happened, they sent forward a great body of reserves with orders to recapture our prisoners. Heavy gunfire rained on us, of which the prisoners got a good share. They begged us hard to save them and we did all we could. But at one stage we were nearly caught when the enemy suddenly turned on a party of liquid fire experts. Fortunately we were alert and charged at once, capturing the whole liquid fire outfit. There ensued a terrible row between the earlier prisoners and the men we had taken with the liquid fire outfit. The first prisoners wanted to kill the liquid fire men. We had our hands full getting them all back."

COSSACK DAY IN REPORTS FROM RUSSIA

These Reports Have the Bolsheviki Losing Ground Rapidly.

KERENSKY AGAIN

Ukrainians Take Much Supplies From Disarmed Maximalists.

London Cable says—Reports on the Russian internal situation to-night indicate that fighting is continuing in the Don region and that reinforcements have been sent south from Petrograd. It is said that the Cossacks have retaken Rostoff.

A Kiev despatch to-night reports that during the disarming of the Maximalist units there the Ukrainian troops took thirty-five cannon, thirty-five machine guns and 25,000,000 cartridges.

It is stated in other advices that the Russian Government Commissioners are drafting an ultimatum addressed to the Ukraine Rada, recognizing the independence of the Ukraine, but demanding an immediate expression of the Rada's attitude towards the Bolsheviki authorities. The Rada has issued a statement declining to recognize the People's Commissioners as comprising the Government of all Russia, inasmuch as the Don, the Caucasus, Siberia and other parts of Russia have their own Governments.

In connection with the signing and publication of the terms of the armistice on the Russian front, it is stated that the Russian delegation at Brest-Litovsk has been augmented to include Poknovsky, President of the Moscow Soldiers' and Workmen's Council, and others.

The Cossacks reoccupied Rostoff to-day. Reports received here declare they disarmed the Red Guards of the Bolsheviki.

The Maximalist regime is slowly but inevitably riding to a fall. Reliable information from travellers reaching here to-day as well as anti-Bolsheviki newspapers smuggled via Haparanda, indicate even the Petrograd garrison no longer supports the Lenine-Trotzky ring.

Twenty-six of Russia's Provinces and territories have formally refused recognition of the Bolsheviki "Government," and every Bolsheviki claim from Petrograd must be heavily discounted.

"Terrorism reigns in Petrograd. The cleverest intrigues of the old Russian regime are aiding the extremists in playing on the minds of the ignorant masses of the soldiers by fairy tales that there will be an immediate revolution in Germany. The date set for opening of the Constituent Assembly was the occasion for a monster demonstration in Petrograd in favor of this meeting.

A report that former Premier Kerensky of Russia, support by some thousands of troops, has appeared in the vicinity of Petrograd is contained in a despatch from Haparanda, in Sweden, at the Finnish frontier, to the Berlingske Tidende. The Bolsheviki are said to have sent troops against him.

The Petrograd Soviet, evidently with the intention of strengthening the hands of the People's Commissioners in dealing with the Constituent Assembly, has passed a resolution demanding an immediate decree for quashing the elections of all Cadet Deputies. In receiving a military deputation, Leon Trotzky, the Bolsheviki Foreign Minister, declared the People's Commissioners were engaged in a merciless and decisive struggle against the Cadet party, and would stop at nothing in the prosecution of class warfare.

As matters stand, there is little prospect of an early meeting of the Constituent Assembly. The Bolsheviki members are leaving Petrograd in compliance with stated injunctions from the Government. Yesterday the committee charged with the superintendence of elections endeavored to hold a meeting in the Taurid Palace, but was prevented from doing so by soldiers. A separate sitting of Ukraine Deputies to the Kieff. About 150 were present, all except twelve Social Revolutionaries.

Many cases of robbery, housebreaking and violence have been reported the last few days. In some instances large sums of money were carried away by armed bands. The looting of wine cellars continues, notwithstanding the exhortations for sobriety by the Government. Many formerly quiet neighborhoods are nightly disturbed by Bacchanalian orgies, accompanied by reports of firearms. Troops whose sentiments are uncertain are being removed from the city and their place is being taken by Lettish regiments and Red Guards.

The Russian Daily News announces that the People's Commissioners have decided to cancel all foreign loans. This measure will be carried out when it is definitely ascertained if the Allies will refuse to participate in the peace negotiations. Whether this threat is simply a mode of putting pressure upon the Allies time will show. Various hints of such an intention on the part of the Government have appeared for some time past in the Bolshevist press.

ALLY HEAD IS NOT FEASIBLE

Generalissimo for Armies is Impracticable,

Says London Times Military Expert.

(By Col. Repington, Military Correspondent of the London Times.)

London Cable—The Times military correspondent discusses the question of appointing a generalissimo of the allied armies, and dismisses the idea as impracticable. He admits that such an appointment would meet the wishes of the French, who, he says, are disappointed because the British will not consent to this, but is convinced that the scheme would prove a failure.

The writer cites various occurrences to show that the centralization of the command in Germany has not prevented great German failures and almost catastrophes, while he argues that the German successes are more owing to the internal weaknesses of Germany's enemies than to her own strength. He maintains that the appointment of a generalissimo for the allies would start friction; everyone would grumble and become suspicious, and if the troops of one of the nations failed everybody would denounce the generalissimo, and the resentment would be intense.

"The fact has to be accepted," says the correspondent, "that an army can stand defeat under its own chiefs, but cannot stand defeat incurred in obeying the orders of a foreign general. National pride, arrogance and prejudices are aroused and the real bond of an alliance, mutual understanding, soon breaks. It must be accepted as an axiom of this war that not a single one of the allies is prepared to accept a position of subordination."

The writer also thinks it highly improbable that the Governments would accept the dictum of a foreign generalissimo.

SWISS READY FOR DEFENCE.

Geneva Cable — President Felix Calonder, in the first public speech he has delivered since his recent election said here to-day that the Swiss people were ready to pour out their blood against anyone who might attempt to invade their country. Switzerland, declared the President, would defend her neutrality to the end.

TEUTONS FAIL AT MT. SOLAROLO

Heavy Attacks Repulsed by Italians.

New Contingents Called to Colors.

Rome Cable says—Vigorous attacks by the Austro-Germans on the Monte Solarolo salient were repulsed to-day, according to the announcement of the War Office.

New contingents have been called up by the Government. The classes of troops already mobilized consist of all eligibles and fit men between the ages of eighteen and forty-three.

FOE CLAIMS 1,000 PRISONERS.

Berlin Cable—The supplementary statement from general headquarters this evening says:

"In successful engagements in the mountains west of the Brenta (Italian front) the Austro-Hungarians took more than a thousand prisoners.

"Italian attacks against Monte Solarolo failed. East of Monte Solarolo parts of an enemy position were taken."

FOE SOCIALISTS ARE OBDURATE

They Are Opposed to a Separate Peace.

Barred From Armistice Deliberations.

Stockholm Cable—An entirely new turn has been given to peace negotiations between the Bolsheviki Government of Russia and the Central Powers by the attitude of the Socialist parties in Germany and Austria.

They were not allowed to have their say at the armistice conferences at Brest-Litovsk, but are sending emissaries at Stockholm.

Thus M. Weltner, a representative of the Hungarian Social Democrats, says definitely that his party is opposed to a separate peace with Russia, because they are convinced it would fill the sails of the German annexationists.

Hungarian Social Democrats want a general peace without annexation or indemnities, and believe a separate peace with Russia would so strengthen the annexationists as to make a democratic peace impossible. They want a Stockholm conference.

RUSS-TEUTON PEACE PARLEY

Enemy Foreign Ministers Off to Confer.

Ally Diplomats Asked as to Their Plans.

Petrograd Cable — The German and Austrian Foreign Ministers, Dr. von Kuehlmann and Count Czernin have notified Leon Trotzky, the Bolsheviki Foreign Minister, that they will arrive at Brest-Litovsk on Tuesday to begin negotiations for a general European peace.

The evening newspapers announce that Trotzky has notified the Allied Embassies that the armistice has reached definite results, and that peace negotiations will begin, and asking them to participate, or to state whether they wish peace or not.

Up to this evening the Embassies had not received the communication, and an informal conference of the allied diplomats is said to have reached no definite decision.

FOE RECKLESS AS TO LOSSES

Used 27 Divisions in Three Weeks at Cambrai.

British Holdings Are Still Very Important.

(By Perry Robinson.)

London Cable says—In a despatch to the Daily News from France, Saturday, Perry Robinson says the ten days of quiet since the British fell back upon their line, near Cambrai, justify them in regarding operations there, at least for all historical purposes, as a closed incident. Whatever else may take place will be the beginning of a new chapter. Surveying the operations at Cambrai as a whole, Robinson says the results of the first stage were as follows:

"We had broken and held the advance and main lines of the Hindenburg system to the length of about 14,000 yards and the support line to the length of about 10,000 yards. We had taken 12,000 prisoners and large numbers of trench mortars and munitions. We had overrun 40 square miles of enemy territory and had the whole Flesquieres Ridge in our hands, as well as canal crossings and Bourlon Wood on one side and important ground by Lateau Wood on the other.

"Our higher command expected the counter-attack. When it came, guards and cavalry, which a few days before had been fighting on the most advanced front, and had been withdrawn, presumably to rest, were in fact handy for the counter-attack at the most critical point of our line, where, indeed, the enemy succeeded in breaking through.

"From captured maps and orders we know exactly what were the enemy's plans, and how confident he was of achieving success. His troops fought stubbornly. That he failed was due to our magnificent defence, and the presence of those reserves, including the guards and cavalry.

"We still hold the whole of the Hindenburg system to the length of about 9,000 yards of main line and 7,000 yards of support, and we keep twelve or thirteen square miles of ground won with three villages. Certainly the German losses were greatly in excess of ours.

"The Germans in the course of three weeks have employed here not less than twenty-seven divisions (about 270,000 men), and presumably more. When they threw their masses against us on November 30 they were playing for big stakes and were absolutely reckless of losses. The slaughter in at least three sections of the battlefield was horrible."

NO PAPAL NOTE

At Christmas, to Appeal for Peace.

Rome Cable—Mgr. Ceretti, Papal Under-Secretary of State, Archbishop of Corinth, and formerly [illegible] to the staff of the Papal [illegible] Washington, made [illegible] day: "The report [illegible] unscrupulous journ[illegible] that the Holy Fath[illegible] Christmas peace note to [illegible] is absolutely false. The Holy [illegible] has not the least intention of issuing any appeal whatever for peace at this juncture. I hope widespread publication will be given to this official denial.

"I do not know why people who never take the trouble to approach the Vatican for information spread these false reports, which can only be harmful."

TEUTON DRIVE COSTLY FAILURE

Cannot Pierce the Lines Guarding Italy.

Are Driven Back to Former Positions.

London Cable—On the Northern Italian front there have been sanguinary encounters between the opposing infantry, and in these the Austro-German forces again have met with defeat in attempts to pierce the Italian front and advance toward the Venetian Plains.

Caprille Hill, at the head of the San Lorenzo Valley, where last week the Italians were forced to cede ground, again has been attacked by the enemy, but the operation brought him nothing but heavy casualties, as he was driven back to his former line.

"Austro-German forces which attacked the Italian lines on the northern front from the line of the San Marino were driven back in disorder," the War Office announced today.

"In the Col Caprille region the Italians attacked, and then were counter-attacked. Finally the enemy had to withdraw to the positions from which he started."

British troops are now making their influence felt on the Italian front. Counter-attacks have recently been growing more frequent on the part of the Italians and this British thrust gives added indication that more aggressive tactics are being adopted by the allies in opposition to the Austro-German invaders.

The British drive was on the mountain line just to the west of the Piave, northwest of Monte Tomba.

WHITE PLAGUE RAVAGES FOES

London Cable—Tuberculosis mortality in the Central Empires shows a terrible increase during the war, according to official statistics. In Prussia the increase over 1913 has been 77 per cent., in Bavaria 40, in Saxony 66, in Wurttemberg 40, in Baden 45, in Hesse 159, in Alsace-Lorraine 44, and in other States 50.

Figures for Vienna show an increase of 95 per cent., for Prague 72, and for Budapest 100. In London the increase is 17 per cent.

The continuous decrease of nutritious food and fats in the Central Empires is a more potent cause of these appalling figures than the actual privations of the battlefield.

Happy New Year.

Resolve to make your life, in the year 1918, count for more in real service to yourself, your friends and the Empire, than any other time in your life.

The bakers are having a little fight down in Brantford. Meantime bread has dropped to six cents a loaf. If Brantford people could only get the coal men scrapping, they'd be in fine shape to enjoy life.

Who'll be our reeve? Frankly there have been plenty of good men mentioned, but most decline. Since Reeve Izzard has accepted his new position he is not now available. Port Elgin must get a man. Perhaps an honorarium attached to the position might make it more attractive? After a man has served faithfully he's hardly thanked, let alone reimbursed for time contributed.

The London Advertiser says:

"Nothing should be said or done, no matter how bitter the feeling of the last few weeks, to stir the Quebec trouble. We should forget all about the heated things, and join forces to have unity. Liberals should not sit back and dare the Government to make good, hoping to see it fail, and to run against trouble in Quebec. The fair way and the British way is to strive for harmony, and to secure a willing obedience to the law from coast to coast."

This is the higher standard. Will we measure up to it?

* * *

A short time ago Lloyd George said England would not be made to suffer for want of foodstuffs. Lately we have been reading despatches which set forth that Britain is face to face with a food crisis. Compulsory rationing has had to be enforced with both the rich and poor. Every ounce of food wasted in Canada, or neglect, on the part of any one who can, to produce food, is by his neglect helping the enemy.

The Globe says Messrs. Oliver and Cross were responsible for misleading Sir Wilfrid Laurier as to western sentiment. These two men seemed to have more weight with him than Mr. J. W. Dafoe, of Winnipeg, who urged upon Sir Wilfrid the fact that the west would assert itself, and that it would find its leaders in other men unless its views were heeded now. The west voted solidly union, and thus declared itself as a force to be reckoned with hereafter.

* * *

The war outlook is not too bright. Germany has been able to take from the Russian front a million men as reinforcements for the western front. This means that the allies must hold back from any further big offensives until the United States gets its its army up to a million strength, which cannot be made possible before summer 1918. All the British people will need to still bear in mind that the war is not won, by any means, and that there is still need for every one to do all they can to assist the allies.

Liberals who voted union, are expecting that the government, now composed of the strongest men of both parties outside of Quebec, will proceed speedily along the lines of seeing that no province shirks its duty when it comes to supplying the men under the Military Service Act. It may be that Quebec will heed the warning given to it by the solid union vote in Ontario and the west and will begin to pay a little more attention to what its duties are in this world conflict. If they do not, well, it's a task the union government must undertake, and it must see it through.

Monday the town and townships nominations take place. Just now the names of prominent men are being gone over by the electors in Ontario municipalities for the offices of reeve and councillors, and just now also the men who might be selected are saying to themselves: 'I do not want it." The frequent acclamations given in all parts of Ontario of recent years have helped to turn people's interest from home politics. Where there is not a friendly rivalry for these positions the honor attached to them decreases and the municipalities lose in this lack of interest. It does a municipality no harm to have a good-natured contest for the chief positions, and any man who cannot contest for these places in a gentlemanly way and take defeat or election as becomes a man, should not court a nomination. If a community desires to progress and to do its share in all the undertakings of the nation of which it forms a part, it should see that it selects the broad-minded and active men.

Perhaps you've said a good deal about the awful catastrophe at Halifax, and how distressing it all must be to the 25,000 homeless people, but is your sympathy strong enough to reach your pocketbook. It's money they need in Halifax.

ANOTHER YEAR

The Times greatly appreciates the staunch support it has received from its readers the past year. The editor has found his labors, for the most part very pleasant. True, it may be that we have not pleased all in the expression of some of our ideas, but we rejoice in knowing that our readers have taken them kindly and considerately.

During the year past our work has been saddened many times in the passing from this life of some of the best of our men and women. Then, too, the ravages of this cruel war has entered many of the homes which The Times visits, and has taken that stalwart boy, and in some cases the only son. We have felt, and do feel, for all the mothers, fathers, and families who have sad hearts. The terrible conflict continues, and those who have fighters at the front are ever possessed of fear of fatal news. The splendid manner in which our people are bearing these burdens is inspiring, and we know we are earnestly joined by all when we express the hope that ere another year has passed the foe will have been beaten back, and peace is our portion once more. May we who remain at home, while brave men are battling for us, prove ourselves to be worthy, as they are worthy.

Central Appeal Judge Exempts Farmers

A great deal has been heard lately as to whether or not farmers will get exemption, and whether the announcement that they would was merely an election dodge, is better understood when a case coming before the Central Appeal Judge deals directly with the subject, and has no bearing with recent local appointments by the Minister of Agriculture.

From the following then, it is apparent that the judges will not take a person who has been habitually and effectively engaged in the production of food.

Mr. Justice Duff has said:

"The proper conclusion appears to be that a competent person, who has been effectively engaged in labour essential to such production, ought not to be withdrawn from it".

"It is perhaps unnecessary to say that such exemptions are not granted as concessions on account of personal hardship, still less as a favor to a class. The sole ground of them is that the national interest is the better served by keeping these men at home. The supreme necessity (upon the existence of which, is founded) that leads the State to take men by compulsion and put them in the fighting line, also requires that men shall be kept at home who are engaged in work essential to enable the State to maintain the full efficiency of the combatant forces, and whose places cannot be taken by others not within the class called out".

Regardless of any other argument, or any political contingency, it would appear, from the ruling of the Justice that the Military Service Act contains within itself all the power required for selective conscription, and that it provides for keeping men at home as well as sending them to war.

THANKING THE ELECTORS

Thanking the Electors of North Bruce on Monday night, Col. Clark said: "I am not vain enough or foolish enough to imagine that the large majority you gave me is a personal triumph, for it is not. It came to me as an advocate of a popular cause. Similarly I trust my opponent will not regard it as a personal defeat, for it is not. He stands high in the estimation of the people and has an excellent reputation in Southampton, where he was born and lived for twenty-five years. Electors were not voting against him personally. They were voting against his leader and the policy he represented.

Again, I thank the electors of North Bruce and particularly the ladies for this expression of their confidence".

Special services and music were features in most all of the churches Sunday.

Final Appeal Judge Gives Ruling on Exemption of Farmers

Mr. Justice Duff (the Final Court of Appeal) Declares it is Essential that there shall be No Diminution in Agricultural Production.

(Published by authority of Director of Publir Information, Ottawa.)

Hon. Mr. Justice Duff gave judgment on December 6th, in the first test case brought before him, as Central Appeal Judge (the final court of appeal), for the exemption of a farmer. The appeal was made by W. H. Rowntree in respect of his son, W. J. Rowntree, from the decision of Local Tribunal, Ontario, No. 421, which refused a claim for exemption. The son was stated to be an experienced farm hand, who had been working on the farm continuously for the past seven years, and ever since leaving school. He lives and works with his father, who owns a farm of 150 acres near Weston, Ontario. With the exception of a younger brother, he is the only male help of the father on the farm. The father is a man of advanced years.

In granting the man exemption "until he ceases to be employed in agricultural labor," Mr. Justice Duff said:

"The Military Service Act does not deal with the subject of the exemption of persons engaged in the agricultural industry; and the question which it is my duty to decide is whether the applicant being and having been, as above mentioned, habitually and effectively engaged in agriculture and in labor essential to the carrying on of agricultural production, ought to be exempted under the provisions of the Military Service Act.

"These two propositions are indisputable:

"(1) In order that the military power of the allies may be adequately sustained, it is essential that in this country and under the present conditions, there should be no diminution in agricultural production.

"(2) The supply of competent labor available for the purpose of agricultural production is not abundant, but actually is deficient.

"The proper conclusion appears to be that the applicant, a competent person, who had been habitually and effectively engaged in labor essential to such production, ought not to be withdrawn from it.

"It is perhaps unnecessary to say that such exemptions are not granted as concessions on account of personal hardship, still less as a favor to a class. The sole ground of them is that the national interest is the better served by keeping these men at home. The supreme necessity (upon the existence of which, as its preamble shows, this policy of the Military Service Act is founded) that leads the State to take men by compulsion and put them in the fighting line requires that men shall be kept at home who are engaged in work essential to enable the State to maintain the full efficiency of the combatant forces, and whose places cannot be taken by others not within the class called out."

Ottawa, Dec. 8, 1917.

YES! LIFT A CORN OFF WITHOUT PAIN!

Cincinnati authority tells how to dry up a corn or callus so it lifts off with fingers.

You corn-pestered men and women need suffer no longer. Wear the shoes that nearly killed you before, says this Cincinnati authority, because a few drops of freezone applied directly on a tender, aching corn or callus, stops soreness at once and soon the corn or hardened callus loosens so it can be lifted out, root and all, without pain.

A small bottle of freezone cost very little at any drug store, but will positively take off every hard or soft corn or callus. This should be tried as it is inexpensive and is said not to irritate the surrounding skin.

If your druggist hasn't any freezone tell him to get a small bottle for you from his wholesale drug house. It is fine stuff and acts like a charm every time.

May Happiness and Prosperity abound with all in 1918.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

LESSON XIII.
December 30, 1917.
God's Redeeming Love—Review.—Psalms 123, 131
(A reading lesson only.)

SUMMARY.—Lesson I. Topic: Restoration. Place: Jerusalem. The writer of the psalms which constitute the lesson sounds notes of joy and gives utterance to pleas for mercy. There is thanksgiving for deliverance and there is petition for a revival among his people. Jehovah is recognized as the help of his people. There is a promise of success to those who labor earnestly for him. As surely as there is a faithful sowing of effort for the salvation of men, there will be a joyful harvest.

II. Topic: Release from captivity. Places: Babylon; Jerusalem. The seventy years of Judah's captivity in Babylon had passed and the Lord moved the heart of King Cyrus to issue a proclamation to the Jews to return to Jerusalem and build up the house of the Lord. The king gave the Jews great assistance in their undertaking and many improved the opportunity of returning. This is a remarkable instance of God's faithfulness in keeping his promises to his people, even employing a heathen king as an agent in their fulfilment.

III. Topic. The temple rebuilt. Place: Jerusalem. The task of the exiles, after providing homes for themselves, was to undertake the restoration of the system of worship. Without [illegible] wait to build the temple, [illegible] an altar on the site of [illegible] and then set about [illegible] of the temple under the [illegible] of Zerubbabel. In spite of hindrances and opposition the temple was finished and dedicated amid the shouts and weeping of the people.

IV. Topic: Armed faith. Places: Babylon; Jerusalem. Seventy-eight years after the return of Jewish exiles under the leadership of Zerubbabel another company returned under the leadership of Ezra. After a period of fasting and prayer, and after special precautions were taken for the security of the large amount of treasure which was being taken, the company set out on their long journey to Jerusalem, where they arrived in safety. The Lord's hand is seen in their success.

V. Topic: The God of battles. Place: Samaria. The temperance lesson is taken from the history of Israel in the town of Ahab. Although the nation was corrupt, the Lord had compassion on the people and drove back the great army of Syria. Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, and his chief officers gave themselves up to strong drink, and the army of Israel easily defeated the Syrian army. The use of intoxicants resulted in a great defeat then, and their use is no less disastrous now.

VI. Topic: True patriotism. Place: Shushan, in Persia. Nehemiah was a Jewish captive and was a trusted officer of the king. He heard of the desolation of Jerusalem and was sad. He prayed earnestly for his people and prayed that the Lord would give him favor with the king and open the way for him to go to Jerusalem to build up the walls of the city. He was sure that the Lord was able to afford just the help that was needed.

VII. Topic: Qualified leadership. Places: Shushan, in Persia; Jerusalem. When King Artaxerxes saw Nehemiah's sad countenance, he inquired the cause. Nehemiah told him the condition of Jerusalem, and lifting his heart to God in prayer, sought permission from the king to go to his own land and try to improve conditions there. His request was granted and the king gave him much assistance in every way. Nehemiah received signal answer to his prayer.

VIII. Topic: Spiritual meditation. Place: Probably Jerusalem. Psalm 103 is full of expressions of praise to God. The writer dwells much on the goodness of God. He is merciful, is just and is faithful in keeping his promises. He removes our transgressions from us as far as the east is from the west. God is upon the throne of the universe. All the world is called upon to praise the Lord.

IX. Topic: Opposition. Place: Jerusalem. Nehemiah saw the extent of the ruins of the city and set about building up the walls and certain structures in the city. The enemies of the Jews tried by derision and conspiracy to hinder the work. Nehemiah took precautions and the workers labored under the protection of guards.

X. Topic: Spiritual progress. Place: Jerusalem. The walls of Jerusalem were completed. The law of the Lord had been broken by the people. Ezra and Nehemiah undertook to teach the Jews the word of God. There was a great assembly called and the book of the law was read to the people, who were deeply impressed by it. The feast of Tabernacles was observed with great enthusiasm, and there was much joy among the people.

XI. Topic: Law enforcement. Place: Jerusalem. Nehemiah found that there was much desecration of the Sabbath. Many were carrying on ordinary work on the Sabbath, both in the city and in the country. He had the gates of the city closed during the day and threatened to arrest those who persisted in desecrating the day. He succeeded in breaking up the evil practise. The Sabbath-breakers came to know that Nehemiah was determined to put an end to their evil, even if he had to arrest those who were guilty of violating the law of the Sabbath.

XIII. Topic: A message for the times. Place: Jerusalem. Malachi was the last of the Old Testament prophets. He uttered a clear prophecy of the coming of the forerunner of the Messiah and of the coming of the Messiah Himself. He showed the people their sins and exhorted them to return to the Lord. They should bring in all the tithes and offerings. Great blessings would be bestowed upon them.

PRACTICAL SURVEY.

Topic.—National restoration.

I. Reviewed with gratitude and praise.

II. Promoted under strong leadership.

III. Divinely prospered through prayer.

IV. Established on piety and patriotism.

I. Reviewed with gratitude and praise. The lessons of this quarter present a turning-point in the history of the Jewish nation. From the melancholy history of a decadent nation, which found its chastisement in a long period of captivity, we began this quarter with psalms of deliverance, the details of which are worked out through the quarter's study. The bitterness of exile brought to pass God's sovereign will in the complete recovery of His people from their inclination to idolatry. The humiliation of slavery, the deprivation of all religious independence, the memory of their ruined city with all the temple services, the ever-present scenes of open idolatry, all served to complete their humiliation and turn their desires toward pure worship and freedom in its exercise. In a retrospect of the wonderful event of release from captivity and the manner in which it was brought about the psalmist endeavored to describe the feelings and conduct of the delivered people. In an expression of personal experience for the mercy of God with every added blessing, the psalmist views all humanity as indebted to God for the same great deliverance from sin and its consequences.

II. Promoted under strong leadership. While the captives were being purified through chastisement, God was causing such changes in the formation of nations as to bring about the fulfilment of His promises to His people. Contrary to the customs of conquering nations, the generous proposal was made by Cyrus to liberate a whole nation of slaves, not to transport them for his own advancement, but to send them forth to re-establish their national religion. He impressed strongly the object of his proclamation and confessed his conviction that such a plan had been given him from the God of those people to whom he offered liberty. That there existed among the exiled people some devout souls in whom the Spirit of God still dwelt, was clearly evident in the heroic effort made by a representative company in their response to the opportunity to take definite steps toward rebuilding God's sanctuary where they might again worship God according to His word. Conditions at Jerusalem reminded the feeble company of the great evil which sin had brought upon them and the long, weary toil that was involved in an effort to recover their ruined city. They could never attain to former excellence in the construction of a temple.

III. Divinely prospered through prayer. Nehemiah could not pray for the prosperity of his people without himself being willing to sacrifice his own comfort to become their leader. It was a tremendous situation. He could not discern the best way to proceed. He knew that God had a plan. He knew that God could find a way to enable him to go. He knew that God could influence the king to provide for the undertaking. He made it his habit to pray every situation into success, not only in the matter of securing authority, but throughout his whole stay he was a man of prayer.

IV. Established on piety and patriotism. Jerusalem was the strongly contested stronghold of Jewish possessions. It was the city of their fathers, the centre of their religious worship. Piety and patriotism mingled inseparably in their efforts to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple. It must be held as a place where every tribe could engage in the temple services. It must be kept for national festivals where the unity of the nation could be maintained. At great cost they struggled to fortify it against other nations. They were greatly prospered as they adhered closely to the fundamental basis of their restoration. Any laxity in the obedience of God's law or their covenant with him brought distress and complications from intruding nations. A glimpse into Israel's history during Ahab's idolatrous reign reveals the bitterness of forsaking the God of all nations. The ever-radiant light of the star of Bethlehem shines through the closing lesson of the quarter. In Christ Jesus "the desire of all nations" was manifested.

FUTURE PRICES FOR LIVE STOCK

Indicated by $2.00 Per Bushel for Wheat Next Year Guaranteed by the U. S. Government—Feed Relatively Cheaper Than Live Stock.

Practically ever since the war started farmers have been urged by the government to produce more food, and as a whole they have responded nobly. At the present time live stock men are being asked to help increase production by conserving their breeding animals so that as many animals may be raised as possible. This suggests the interesting question: "Which is producing the most food, the man who raises live stock or the man who grows grain exclusively?

One of the best ways of estimating the value of a food is by the amount of energy giving nutrients it contains. The Calorie is the unit of heat, which is one form of energy. And the rations of our soldiers at the front are made up so that each man receives the equivalent of so many Calories a day.

It is estimated that a crop of 35 bushels of oats to the acre is equivalent to 1,264,400 Calories. It is also estimated that, on the average, 350 pounds of pork is produced from an acre. This amount of pork contains 672,945 calories. That is, about twice as much food, reckoned as calories, is produced from an acre where oats are grown as would be produced from an acre where pigs are raised. Even less calories are produced per acre where cattle or sheep are raised. Where milk is produced 711,750 calories are produced per acre.

The figures show very clearly that acre for acre the grain farmer is producing more actual food than the live stock man. There are many reasons, however, why it would not be wise for the individual, or even in the national interests, for men who have been raising live stock to change their methods of farming and grow nothing but grain crops. The most important reason probably is that raising live stock and returning all the manure to the land is one of the best and cheapest ways of maintaining the fertility of the soil. A cow or a steer will produce from 6 to 8 tons of manure during a six months' feeding period. This manure will be worth anywhere from $10 to $20 per ton as measured by increase in crop yield. This should be considered when one is considering the advantages and disadvantages of keeping live stock.

Even though prices for feeding stuffs appear exorbitant the prices being obtained for cattle, sheep and pigs are very high, and with the world food shortage it appears that prices will remain high for some time to come. During the month of November the price of cattle increased about 38 per cent., the price of sheep advanced 44 per cent., and the price of hogs advanced 63 per cent. over the price obtained during the same month last year. Although the price of feeding stuffs has advanced it has not advanced in nearly the same proportion. Thus oats during November were 8 per cent. higher, and oil cake 20 per cent. higher. That is, while the price of cattle, sheep and hogs have increased on the average of 46 per cent. the average price of the feeds mentioned has only increased 13 per cent.

Prices so far as the dairyman is concerned are not quite so favorable. While the price of cheese at the cheese boards during the summer was about 25 per cent. higher than last year, the price of butter during November only increased 5 per cent. over that of last year.

There is a big surplus of corn in the United States, and it is estimated that the production of oats in Ontario will amount to 103,450,000 bushels this year as compared with only 80,771,000 bushels last year, although the total yield for the whole of Canada, it is estimated, will be somewhat less than last year. On the whole, the yields of fodder crops, such as roots, corn silage, hay, etc., have been good, so that the breeder of live stock is in a much more favorable position this year than he was last year.

When one attempts to prophesy what future price of live stock will be he is on dangerous ground. If the amount of food produced in the world is greatly increased, even though there is a shortage of live stock, prices for live stock will tend to go down because hogs, sheep or cattle, after all only represent so many calories and if the total number of calories in farm produce produced by the world is greatly increased the price of food must go down whether that food be live stock or grain.

There is a shortage of some 33,000,000 hogs in Europe. With about 3,500,000 hogs in Canada and somewhat less than 70,000,000 hogs in the States, this shortage could be made good in less than six months. The possible increase from one sow is 1,093 pigs in four years, on the supposition that all litters consist of six pigs, that all live, that half are females, and that each gilt should farrow at one year and every six months thereafter. Prices for hogs during the coming year will probably be good, not because there is a shortage of hogs, but because there is a world shortage of Calories, as represented by farm produce.

The United States Government has guaranteed farmers a price of $2 per bushel next year for their wheat, and this is a pretty good indication of what the prices for live stock will be.

PRONOUNCING WORDS.

A Test and Flippant Fling at the Critic and His Theory.

Comes now another to trouble us in these days when the wayfarer has already enough bothers to keep him from lingering overlong in his humble repose. It is a man who has discovered that there are 25,000 English words more or less commonly mispronounced and who would show us how to rescue ourselves from the disgrace.

By way of illustration he challenges all comers to try to pronounce offhand such words as antipasto, arcadian, marguerite, batman, beautiful, bourgeois, brevier, buoy, demy, ingleman, small, oboe, rowlock, tassel, vase and valiantly. He intimates that anybody who can give them all correctly can qualify as a .300 hitter in the pronunciation league, but still has a long way to go before he reaches perfection.

But what of it. An oboe sounds as sweet whether one calls it an oh-boe or an oh-boy. If the writer of this article told his printer to set it in boorzhwah type the printer probably would call a meeting of the chapel and insist on a strike vote. You can call it a vase or vawze, but it takes a dime to get it filled, where it used to cost only 5 cents. As to demy and valiantly, most of us have got along very well for a good many years without writing or speaking either of them and hope to struggle along the same way at least until we have a little rest from worry over the high cost of potatoes.

The hardest thing about it is to determine which of several schools of pronunciation is most desirable—the London, the Melbourne, the Canadian, the Texas, the Massachusetts, the Alabama, the Georgia or the Missouri. Moreover, if 25,000 words are mispronounced most of us are democratic enough to let the majority rule and be willing to make it unanimous. — St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

TRUE RICHES.

It is the mind that maketh good or ill,
That maketh wretch or happy, rich or poor:
For some that hath abundance at his will,
Hath not enough, but wants in greatest store
And other, that hath little, asks no more,
But in that little is both rich and wise;
For wisdom is most riches; fools therefore
They are which fortune do by vows devise,
Since each unto himself his life may fortunize.

ENDURE HARDNESS.

I have given him for a witness to the people, a leader and commander to the people.

It became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings. We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God.

We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God. —We do not war after the flesh: for the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds.

The God of all grace, who hath called us unto His eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you.

THE EVIL EYE.

(By the Late Rev. H. T. Miller.)

One of the most appalling and widespread terrors that brood over the mind of British India to-day is the Evil Eye. This is only another name for witchcraft, or sorcery. The darkest blot on the colonies of North America was part of the inheritance of the old country. Let us hope we may safely prophesy that no more witches will be burnt under the British flag, or Stars and Stripes. What a terror two hundred years ago; a deep-seated and far-reaching superstition which darkly penetrated into the holiest relationships of domestic and social life. Neither rank, nor religion, nor learning was exempt from its influence.

John Wesley said, "The giving up witchcraft is in effect giving up the Bible." Blackstone said, "To deny the possibility, nay, actual existence, of witchcraft and sorcery, is at once flatly to deny the revealed word of God." These two names will live in English literature. But we simply stand amazed at the words of these great, good men. What are we to understand by the Word of God, the Bible. It is a book printed in Paradise, and then let down for the guidance of sinful men? Nay! it is a human book, a good, honest book; it puts on record facts of human life, blemishes as well as beauties. Let us clear the ground and see where we stand, and then ask these great men what they mean by the Bible. Do they mean that because these facts, or assumed facts, are recorded in the Bible, that therefore, these terrible marks of mental bondage have the sanction of the God of the Bible? "Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it?" Does He do it? Is God the author of evil? Let us pause before we answer. Scripture precedents are not precedents for me. Apostolic practice has no enforcement for me. Paul said circumcision is nothing, the law is a shadow. Christ sent me not to baptize. I thank God I only baptized a couple, a mere trifling fragment in my calling as an apostle. Clear the ground, I am free, ye are called unto liberty.

It is truly humbling to think of these two great Englishmen. One an authority in religion, the other in the law of the land, to put themselves on record, as being in bondage to enslaving, and degrading, and most objectionable care fretted devastation. Is there a fresh need to write again the plain man's pathway to heaven. Will learned men boil down their learning and give us a few rules, how to find our way through conflicting currents, through muddy waters, tell us what we are to throw overboard as no longer fit for use. More especially, and here is a stupendous task; not to read the Old Testament into the New. We have read way out of the old into the new, with unparalleled disaster. We have loaded up baggage wagons with old furniture, we have hugged the very stones, crumbling in their ruins, when the Master, in His dignity and authority has said, "there shall not be left one stone upon another."

Have we duly considered the perils of eminent men? They risk their reputation by putting skeletons in the cupboard, and keeping them there. Was it not a trait in the character of the great Dr. Chalmers to divide his life into decades, to review, revise and enlarge? Did not John Milton do the same? Did he not revise himself out of the machinery of the church? That was a severe mark of growth, but it was growth.

Father Hyacinth, the famous French preacher, was no mean factor in the lift of the nation. He had long discontinued the use of any sacraments, and desired none on his death-bed. His last words were, "I can appear before God; I am at peace."

"Unless above himself he can Erect himself, how poor a thing is man."

H. T. Miller.

The man who is killed with kindness would probably have been a dead one, anyway.

CONSIDER PEDIGREES IN YOUR HERD

Study Both Individuality and Pedigree.

In buying an animal for breeding purposes I am very particular to see that it has a good pedigree. I have heard men say that they did not care anything about getting a pedigree, but they did want an animal that was good individually.

Considering pedigree of minor importance is one of the worst mistakes a buyer of a breeding animal can make. How often have some of us visited a neighbor who is recognized as a good feeder of any kind of live stock, and in looking over his bunch of pigs or calves found that they are not up to the standard usually kept on his farm. We ask him why it is that his stock are not up to the standard. He will reply, "I don't know. I have taken every care I could of them and even given them special attention, but somehow or other they do not grow as they should." In nine cases out of ten the fault lies in the pedigree of the sire of such animals. It is possible that the sire may have been an animal of good individuality, yet if the pedigree were examined a streak of poor breeding not very far back would probably be revealed.

MUST HAVE GOOD PEDIGREES.

Often we have come across the reverse condition. We visit a neighbor who is not a good feeder and scarcely has his animals up to the standard. In his herd we find good individuality, the animals looking good and thrifty and evidently making good money for him. He is asked how it is that he has a bunch so much better this year than usual. His reply will be, "I don't know, I have not given them any extra care, but they just come along fine." It is a good guess that the sire of these animals had a first class pedigree, showing strong breed character, backed up with easy feeding quality.

It is as much the business of a stock grower to carefully study the pedigree of his animals as it is to study feeds and how best to feed them. We must have a good foundation before we can get the most out of the feed consumed by the animals. To be sure of a good foundation we must have animals of good breeding, which are nothing more or less than animals having good pedigrees.

It is a well known fact among experienced breeders that sometimes there are genuine freaks. By this I mean that there may be an animal of splendid individuality, but having a pedigree that is recognized as practically worthless. In the great majority of cases this animal will prove a dismal failure as a breeder. Sometimes we have the other kind of a freak, an animal of poor individuality but having a good pedigree. If I were compelled to make a choice between the two I would prefer the poor individual with a good pedigree rather than the good individual with the poor pedigree.

It is not, however, necessary for us to use either for breeding purposes and the use of either one is certainly to be discouraged. By giving the matter our careful attention we can easily buy and use an animal of good individuality with an equally good pedigree. What we want is the animal that will produce the greatest amount of meat, milk or wool for the feed consumed. To get this we must not only study the individual, but we must study the pedigree as well. If one's breeding and feeding operations are now satisfactory let him keep them so by going along the same line, only selecting if possible better sires each year. The best and surest way to do this is to study the pedigree.—Canadian Countryman.
